FACTS AND OPINIONS.

A Hint of change.

The end of our long waiting for the advent of strength into the hearts and minds of the people may yet be distant, but one sign of an approaching change is growing more and more manifest, the intense yearning for a field, an outlet, a path open to the pent up activities of an awakened nation. Arising from long sleep and torpor, the nation threw itself with energy into a field of activity which seemed immeasurably vast and full of a glorious promise. One would have said that no one could stop that mighty outpouring of enthusiasm, unselfishness and heaven-aspiring force. But there was a flaw, a source of weakness. Our past defects, hesitations, timidities, weaknesses, vices, arrogance, light-headedness, selfishness, scepticism, inconstancy, our readiness to succumb to difficulties, to despair at the first check,—all these things were in us, trampled down by the inrush of higher feelings and a greater and nobler energy, but not thrown out, not utterly replaced. The nation had entered headlong into a wonderful sadhana, but without knowledge, without the deliberate sankalpa, the requisite diksha. It was the only way it could be begun. But the sadhak has to have chaitanyam before he can attain realisation; he must cleanse his bosom of much perilous stuff. That cleansing is done partly by replacing the lower feelings by the higher, cowardice by courage, hatred by love, weakness by strength, partly by working out the evil in imagination or action and rejecting it as it comes up into the mind or the life. It was the first process that took place in the beginning of the movement, it is the second that is now in progress. In the first years of the movement a nation of cowards became heroes, sceptics became blind believers, the light-minded full of serious purpose, men eaten up by selfishness martyrs and ascetics, waverers full of tenacity, the low, loose and immoral inspired by a high and generous idealism and purity. But the work was not complete. In the groundwork of the new nation the old evil stuff lingered, and therefore God trampled our work to pieces in order to have it out, so that it might be seen, recognized and rejected. It was that work the repressions and reforms have come to do, and it is almost done. Had we gone on in our first victorious rush, unhampered and undefeated, we would have entered the kingdom of Swarnaj with an imperfect national character, full of temporarily repressed vices which would have come to the surface as soon as the great stimulus of a successful struggle had been removed, and the last state of the nation might have been worse than its first; at any rate there would have been infinite troubles, reverses and disasters for the liberated nation, such as are in store for a nation like Persia where the struggle for freedom has not been sufficiently intense, arduous and complicated in its features to purify the people and build its character. It is well to have done with our troubles, reverses and defeats before the end is gained, so that we may enter our kingdom pure and strong. We ought now to be able to recognize what it was that has made us fail in the hour of trial; for there can be no doubt that we have partially failed. To recognize the defects is to reject them, and with the will to rise, will come the means which will help to raise us. The spirit of the nation is rising, again. Only it must be clearly recognized that the old outlets are not the right one. Solid and thorough work, self-discipline by means of noble and orderly action, this is the path by which we shall arrive at a higher national character and evolution.

Preentious shams.

In an unguarded moment our friend and India's, the Statesman of Chowringhee, has for once blurted out the truth. While, in common with other Anglo-Indian papers it designs in strains of dithyrambic eloquence on the magnitude of the reforms the Government in its deep, wise and impossibly sagacious generosity has given and this thrice blessed country has been privileged to receive, it inadvertently admits that the Legislative Councils, as they hitherto existed, were pretentious shams. As we point out in our article this week, the new Councils differ in no way from the old except in being more pretentious. The old were shams because they gave no control to the people while affecting to listen and give consideration to the popular voice, which was, as a matter of fact, only heard to be ignored,—except in very occasional instances which only accentuated the sense of dependence on the caprice of the official governors. The new Councils are of precisely the same character, and the only differences of importance are the non-official majority—so carefully arranged as to secure a permanent popular minority, the increased number of the elected members, and the facilities given for debate. With a permanent popular minority and the denial of all control, this is mere heaping of guilt on the surface of the toy. The Indian papers have recognised the nugatory character of the reforms and the tone of cold dissatisfaction in their comments is very marked. When the Councils begin to work, even the Moderates will realise that the new Councils are not only void of any true principle of popular representation and control, but injurious to the interests of the people.

The Municipalities and Reform.

Under the new conditions, the municipalities and District Boards form a substantial part of the electorate and return a certain proportion of the members. We do not think we exaggerate when we say that the only chance of any really independent popular representatives entering the new Councils is provided by these bodies. The University member or one or two of the landholders may occasionally assert independence, but the chances, at present, are in favour of their belonging to that type of representatives who are satisfied if they can pose as representatives of the nation by merely refusing to agree with the Government in all the details of their policy and measures. The one chance of a robust and healthy opposition lies in the election of independent men by the Municipalities and, to a lesser extent, by the District Boards. They will, however, be in a hopeless minority and will always be liable to disqualification by any of the engines provided for that purpose in the rules, if they support their opposition in the Council by agitation in the country. And we have yet to see what changes will be made in the District Boards and Municipalities under the new policy. Great hopes have been entertained that, whatever may be done in the councils, the municipalities will be made really free and popular bodies, and, we remember, that expectation was urged at the Hughly Conference as a reason for not rejecting the reforms. We doubt whether this expectation will be any more fruitful than the hopes of a great advance towards popular institutions in the reform of the Councils. Under the new scheme the municipalities are the only weak point in the Government armour, and we rather fancy the Government will follow the policy of thorough and mend that point as well. Time will show whether we or the Moderates are right. So far we have always been right in these matters and they have always been wrong, the new Councils being only the latest of numerous instances during the last few years.

Police Unrest in the Punjab.

The action of some of the statesmen of this country seems to be guided by the principle that the best way to bring about a particular object is to try and promote its opposite. They certainly desire the political unrest to cease, but their action seems to be carefully calculated to prolong it. No more irritating action could have been taken in the present state of the public mind than the persistence in sedition-hunting which is being practised on a large scale in the Punjab. There is not the least sign of trouble or violence or even widespread agitation of any kind in that province. The causes which excited agitation and violence formerly were purely local and, with the removal of the cause, the effect, as it was bound to do, disappeared. Since then, the Punjab has been profoundly quiet, and the opposition to the Convention Congress and the convocation of the Hindu Sabha, presided over by the inoffensive a personage as Sir Pratul Chandra Chatterji, were the only signs of life it gave. We wonder, is it the first-mentioned activity which has led to the raids, searches and arrests? The almost universal opposition to a body which has faithfully excluded the Nationalists and enjoys the support and patronage of Mr. Gokhale, may seem to the authorities a certain sign of widespread seditious feeling in the land. Is it by stirring up sedition with a police pole that the Punjab bureaucrats think they can get rid of unrest?

THE REFORMED COUNCILS.

—ooo—

The great measure which is to carry down the name of Lord Morley to distant ages as the inaugurator of a new age in India,—so at least all the Anglo Indian papers and not a few of the Moderates tell us,—is now before us in all its details. The mountains have again been in labour, and the mouse they have produced this time is enormous in size and worthy of the august mountains that produced him, but not the less ridiculous for all that. What is it that this much-trumpeted scheme gives to a people which is not inferior in education or intellectual calibre to the Turk, the Persian and the Chinese who already enjoy or are in sight of full self-government? There are four elements which have always to be considered in a change of this kind, first, the nature of the electorate, second, the composition of the body itself, thirdly, the freedom of election, fourthly, the scope, functions and powers of the assemblies. There is not one of these points in which the people have really gained they are hardly one of them in which there not worse off than under the old system.

What change has been made in the electorates? Except that they have been increased in number, we do not see that there has been any real change at all, and an increase in number is of no value in itself, but only if the number of elected members represent a force sufficient to give the people its proper weight in the legislation and administration of the country. We shall show under the third head that we have gained nothing in this direction. On the other hand not only classes was formerly the case, but creed has been made the basis of representation and, therefore, unless the Hindus have the strength of mind to boycott a system which creates a distinction insulting as well as injurious to the community, this measure, while giving us not an atom of self-government, will be a potent engine for dividing the nation into two hostile interests and barring the way towards the unity of India. Formerly, there were only two classes in India, the superior European and the inferior Indian; now there will be three, the supreme European, the superior Mahomedan and the inferior Hindu. This is loss number one, and it is no small one, to the Mahomedan no less than the Hindu. The official of course gains.

Even if there is no democratic or even semi-democratic basis of election—merely small established bodies which can in no sense be called the people,—something might be gained if the Councils were so composed as to give a preponderance or powerful voice to independent elected representatives. That is what the Councils profess to do and that is why so much parade is made of the non-official majority. What are the facts? In the Viceroy's Council there are to be thirty-five avowedly Government members, twenty-eight being officials and seven nominated. Of the twenty-five elected members eleven will be sent from the new Councils all over India; as we shall show from the Bengal examples these Councils will contain a predominant pro-Government vote even among the non-official members and their representatives will be therefore pro-Government men. That makes forty-six reliable votes for the Government. Of the remaining thirteen two will be Europeans who will naturally side with the Government; that makes forty-nine. Of the remaining eleven five will be specially elected Mahomedan representatives and, as under the new system the Mahomedans are a favoured class depending for the continuance of that favour on good behaviour, that means another five reliable votes for the Government, which makes fifty-four. Of the remaining six all are representatives of the landholding class who dare not be too independent,—although they will no doubt oppose in small matters, which they can do with impunity as there is not the slightest chance of the Government being defeated. The consequence will be that on the Viceroy's Council there is not any reasonable chance of there being a single independent member representing the people. This startling result of the Reforms may not seem at first credible, but if our argument is carefully followed, it will establish itself. No doubt, one or two men like Mr. Gokhale, Sir Pherozshah Mehta or Dr. Rash Behari Ghose will be admitted by permission, but that privilege we had on better terms under the old system.

Let us pass to the Bengal Councils and establish our position. In East Bengal there will be twenty-two nominated and two specially nominated against eighteen elected members establishing at once a standing Government majority of six. Of the eighteen who might oppose, there will be four members who in the nature of things are bound to be Europeans and four specially elected Mahomedan members, which at once raises the reliable Government vote to thirty-two; five representatives of District and Local Boards, who, from the preponderance of Mahomedans on those bodies, are bound to be Mahomedans, two representatives of landholders of whom one at least is likely to be a Mahomedan and the other, being a landholder, cannot afford to be too independent. There remain three members of Municipal bodies who are all likely to be independent, if the elections are not interfered with by indirect pressure. Therefore, out of forty-two members only three are likely to be independent members. It is needless to point out that the representative of the non-official members on the Viceroy's Council is sure to be a pro-Government man.

We pass on to West Bengal where things ought to be better. Here there are twenty-two nominated against twenty-six elected members, giving at first sight a non-Government majority of four. But we have to subtract from the apparent majority and add to the apparent minority four members from European or predominatingly European 'constituencies', four Mahomedan members and the member for the University, now practically a department of the Government. That gives a Government vote of thirty-one and a possible opposition vote of seventeen. Of these again five are representatives of the landholders who cannot be independent to any notable extent and of whom only one or two are likely to be independent at all. There are therefore, only twelve votes of which we can any hope, the representatives of the Boards and Municipalities. Here also the independent section of the community is hopelessly ineffective in numbers. Only four of these will be representatives of Bengal and this is one of the most joyous results of the policy of partition and deportation plus co-operation which is the basis of the new measure. Here again the chances of an independent representative being returned to the Viceroy's Council are small on paper, nil in reality.

When we come to the freedom of the electors in choosing their representatives, we find restrictions so astonishing as at once to expose the spirit and purpose of these reforms. The Boards and Municipalities which alone represent in a faint degree the people are debarred from electing anyone not a member of these bodies. Thus at one blow it is rendered impossible for a popular leader like S. J. Motilal Ghose, unless the Government choose to nominate him, to be on these amazing Councils. Farther, anyone dismissed from Government service, e. g. S. J. Surendranath, sentenced at any time to imprisonment or transportation, e. g. Mr. Tilak, or bound down, e. g. mofussil leaders like S. J. Anath Bandhu Guha or S. J. Hardayal Nag, the leading men of Mymensing and Chandpur respectively, or declared by the authorities to be of undesirable antecedents, e. g. Lala Lajpat Rai, S. J. Aswini Kumar Datta, S. J. Krishna Kumar Mitra and all Nationalists and agitators generally, are ipso facto incapable of representing the people under these exquisite reforms.

After all this it may seem a waste of time to go into the question of the scope, functions and powers of the Councils. They may briefly be summed up by saying that the councils have no scope and no powers, and that they have also no functions except to talk, but by no means freely and no longer at large. We certainly do not object to the rule that no member shall talk for more than fifteen minutes at a stretch; our only regret is that the maximum could not be fifteen seconds. But since to talk inconclusively and ask questions which need not be answered unless the Government likes, is the only activity allowed to the august councillors, it seems like adding injury to insult to hedge in this windy privilege with so many restrictions. The restrictions placed on the putting of interpellations would rule out of order half the questions in the House of Commons. It is curious how carefully the Government has guarded itself against anything which might inconvenience it or put it into a corner. Even to ask any question about the conduct or character of persons except in their official or public capacity, is banned, so that, for instance, if an official misconducts himself in a flagrant manner, so long as he can say that he has done it in his private capacity, the Government cannot be questioned as to the truth of the matter or its intentions with regard to the peccant individual. With a little legal ingenuity we think there is hardly any question, not of the baldest and most insignificant character, which could not be brought under the restricting clauses. And, to crown all, the President is given the power of disallowing any question on the ground that it will inconvenience the State, in other words himself and his Government, and he may disallow any supplementary questions without any reason whatever! Any resolution may be disallowed for a similar reason or absence of reason. When we add that Native States are held sacrosanct from discussion, the Military similarly safeguarded, and that no value need be attached to the resolutions of the Council on the Financial Statement and no resolutions at all can be proposed or passed on the Budget, we think we have said all that is necessary to paint in its true colours the glorious liberality of this most wonderful and unheard of reform. We heartily congratulate Lord

Morley, Lord Minto and their advisers on the skill with which the whole thing has been framed, the Moderates on the glorious price for which one or two of their leaders have sold the popular cause, the Hindus on their humiliation and the country generally on the disillusionment, we hope the final disillusionment which these Councils, when they meet, will bring about far more successfully than could have been done by any Nationalist propaganda.

THE NATIONAL VALUE OF ART.

I

There is a tendency in modern times to depreciate the value of the beautiful and overstress the value of the useful, a tendency curbed in Europe by the imperious insistence of an age-long tradition of culture and generous training of the aesthetic perceptions; but in India, where we have been cut off by a mercenary and soulless education from all our ancient roots of culture and tradition, it is corrected only by the stress of imagination, emotion and spiritual delicacy, submerged but not yet destroyed, in the temperament of the people. The value attached by the ancients to music, art and poetry have become almost unintelligible to an age bent on depriving life of its meaning by turning earth into a sort of glorified anthep or beehive and confusing the lowest, though most primary in necessity, of the means of human progress with the aim of this great evolutionary process. The first and lowest necessity of the race is that of self-preservation in the body by a sufficient supply and equable distribution of food, shelter and raiment. This is a problem which the oldest communistic human societies solved to perfection and without communism it cannot be solved except by a convenient but inequitable arrangement which makes of the majority slaves provided with these primary wants and necessities and ministering under compulsion to a few who rise higher and satisfy larger wants. These are the wants of the vital instincts, called in our philosophy the prana bosh, which go beyond and dominate the mere animal wants, simple, coarse and indiscriminating, shared by us with the lower creation. It is these vital wants, the hunger for wealth, luxury, beautiful women, rich foods and drinks, which disturbed the first low but perfect economy of society and made the institution of private property, with its huge train of evils, inequality, injustice, violence, fraud, civil commotion and hatred, class selfishness, family selfishness and personal selfishness, an inevitable necessity of human progress. The Mother of All works through evil as well as good, and through temporary evil she brings about a better and lasting good. These disturbances were complicated by the heightening of the primitive animal emotions into more intense and complex forms. Love, hatred, vindictiveness, anger, attachment, jealousy and the host of similar passions,—the chitta or mind-stuff suffused by the vital wants of the prana, that which the Europeans call the heart—ceased to be communal in their application and, as personal wants, clamoured for separate satisfaction. It is for the satisfaction of the vital and emotional needs of humanity that modern nations and societies exist, that commerce grows and Science ministers to human luxury and convenience. But for these new wants, the establishment of private property, first in the clan or family, then in the individual, the institution of slavery and other necessary devices the modern world would never have come into existence; for the satisfaction of the primary economic wants and bodily necessities would never have carried us beyond the small commune or tribe. But these primary wants and necessities have to be satisfied and satisfied universally, or society becomes diseased and states convulsed with sedition and revolution.

The old arrangement of a mass of slaves well fed and provided and a select class or classes enjoying in greater or less quantity the higher wants of humanity broke down in the mediaeval ages, because the heart began to develop too powerfully in humanity and under the influence of philosophy, ethics and religion began to spread its claim beyond the person, the class, the family, the clan to the nation and to humanity or to all creation. A temporary makeshift was invented to replace slavery, called free labour, by which men were paid and bribed to accept voluntarily the position of slaves, contenting themselves with the coarse satisfaction of the animal necessities and in return providing by their labour the higher wants of their masters now called superiors or higher classes. This also has become a solution which will no longer serve. The whole of humanity now demands not merely the satisfaction of the body, the anna, but the satisfaction also of the prana and the chitta, the vital and emotional desires. Wealth, luxury, enjoyment for oneself and those dear to us, participation in the satisfaction of national wealth, pride, lordship, rivalry, war, alliance, peace, once the privilege of the few, the higher classes, of prince, burgess and noble are, now claimed by all humanity. Political, social and economic liberty and equality, two things difficult to harmonize, must now be conceded to all men harmonized as well as the present development of humanity will allow. It is this claim that arose, red with fury and blinded with blood, in the French Revolution. This is democracy, this Socialism, this Anarchism; and, however fiercely the privileged and propertied classes may rage, curse and denounce these forerunners of Demogorgon, they can only temporarily resist. Their interests may be hoary and venerable with the sanction of the ages, but the future is mightier than the past and evolution proceeds relentlessly in its course trampling to pieces all that it no longer needs. Those who fight against her fight against the will of God, against a decree written from of old, and are already defeated and slain in the karan jagat, the world of types and causes where Nature fixes everything before she works it out in the visible world. Nihatah purvaneva.

The mass of humanity has not risen beyond the bodily needs, the vital desires, the emotions and the current of thought sensations created by these lower strata. This current of thought sensations is called in Hindu philosophy the manas or mind, it is the highest to which all but a few of the animals can rise, and it is the highest function that the mass of mankind has thoroughly perfected. Beyond the manas is the buddhi, or thought proper, which, when perfected, is independent of the desires, the claims of the body and the interference of the emotions. But only a minority of men have developed this organ, much less perfected it. Only great thinkers in their hours of thought are able to use this organ independently of the lower strata, and even they are besieged by the latter in their ordinary life and their best thought suffers continually from these lower intrusions. Only developed Yogins have a vishuddha buddhi, a thought organ cleared of the interference of the lower strata by chitta-shuddhi or purification of the chitta, the mind-stuff, from the prana full of animal, vital and emotional disturbances. With most men the buddhi is full of manas and the manas of the lower strata. The majority of mankind does not think, it has only thought sensations; a large minority think confusedly mixing up desires, predilections, passions, pre-judgments, old associations and prejudices with pure and disinterested thought. Only a few, the rare aristocrats of the earth, can really and truly think. That is now the true aristocracy, not the aristocracy of the body and birth, not the aristocracy of vital superiority, wealth, pride and luxury, not the aristocracy of higher emotions, courage, energy, successful political instinct and the habit of mastery and rule,—though these latter cannot be neglected,—but the aristocracy of knowledge, undisturbed insight and intellectual ability. It emerges, though it has not yet emerged, and in any future arrangement of human society this natural inequality will play an important part.

Above the buddhi are other faculties which are now broadly included in the term spirituality. This body of faculties is still rarer and more imperfectly developed even in the highest than the thought organ. Most men mistake intellectuality, imaginative inspiration or emotional fervour for spirituality, but this is a much higher function, the highest of all, of which all the others are coverings and veils. Here we get to the fountain, the source to which we return, the goal of human evolution. But although spirituality has often entered into humanity in great waves, it has done so merely to create a temporary impetus and retire into the souls of a few leaving only its coverings and shadows behind to compose and inform the thing which is usually called religion. Meanwhile the thought is the highest man has really attained and it is by the thought that the old society has been broken down. And the thought is composed of two separate sides, judgment or reason and imagination, both of which are necessary to perfect ideation. It is by Science, philosophy and criticism on the one side, by art, poetry and idealism on the other that the old state of humanity has been undermined and is now collapsing, and the foundations have been laid for the new. Of these Science, philosophy and criticism have established their use to the mass of humanity by ministering to the luxury, comfort and convenience which all men desire and arming them with justification in the confused struggle of passions, interests, cravings and aspirations which are now working with solvent and corrosive effect throughout the world. The value of the other side, more subtle and profound, has been clouded to the mass of men by the less visible and sensational character of its workings.

ANANDAMATH.

CHAPTER IX

Mohendra had descended from the cart, wrested a weapon from one of the sepoys and made ready to join in the fight. But at this moment it came home clearly to him that these men were robbers and the plunder of the treasure the object of their attack on the soldiery. In obedience to this idea he stood away from the scene of the fight, for to help the robbers meant to be a partner in their ill-doing. Then he flung the sword away and was slowly leaving the place when Bhavananda came and stood near him. Mohendra said to him, "Tell me, who are you?"

Bhavananda replied, "What need have you to know that?"

"I have a need" said Mohendra. "You have done me to-day a very great service."

"I hardly thought you realized it," said Bhavananda, "you had a weapon in your hand and yet you stood apart. A landholder are you, and that's a man good at being the death of milk and ghee, but when work has to be done, an ape."

Before Bhavananda had well finished his tirade, Mohendra answered with contempt and disgust, "But this is bad work,—a robbery!"

"Robbery or not," retorted Bhavananda "we have done you some little service and are willing to do you a little more."

"You have done me some service, I own," said Mohendra "but what new service can you do me? And at a dacoit's hands I am better unhelped than helped."

"Whether you accept our proffered service or not," said Bhavananda "depends on your own choice. If you do choose to take it, come with me. I will bring you where you can meet your wife and child."

Mohendra turned and stood still. "What is that?" he cried.

Bhavananda walked on without any reply, and Mohendra had no choice but to walk on with him, wondering in his heart what new kind of robbers were these.

CHAPTER X

Silently in the moonlit night the two crossed the open country. Mohendra was silent, sorrowful, full of pride, but also a little curious.

Suddenly Bhavananda's whole aspect changed. No longer was he the ascetic serious of aspect, calm of mood; no longer the skilful fighter, the heroic figure of the man who had beheaded the English captain with the sweep of a sword; no longer had he that aspect with which even now he had proudly rebuked Mohendra. It was as if the sight of that beauty of plain and forest, river and numerous streams, all the moonlit peaceful earth, had stirred his heart with a great gladness: it was as if Ocean were laughing in the moonbeams. Bhavananda became smiling, eloquent, courteous of speech. He grew very eager to talk and made many efforts to open a conversation, but Mohendra would not speak. Then Bhavananda, having no other resource, began to sing to himself.

"Mother, I bow to thee!

Rich with thy hurrying streams,
Bright with thy orchard gleams,
Cool with thy winds of delight,
Dark fields waving, Mother of might,

Mother free!"

The song astonished Mohendra and he could understand nothing of it. Who might be this richly watered, richly fruited Mother, cool with delightful winds and dark with the harvests? "What Mother?" he asked.

Bhavananda without any answer continued his song.

"Glory of moonlight dreams
Over thy beaches and lordly
streams;

Clad in thy blossoming trees,
Mother, giver of ease,
Laughing low and sweet!
Mother, I kiss thy feet.
Speaker sweet and low!
Mother, to thee I bow.

Mohendra said, "That is the country, it is not the Mother."

Bhavananda replied, "We recognize no other Mother. 'Mother and Motherland is more than heaven itself.' We say the motherland is our mother. We have neither mother nor father nor brother nor friend, wife nor son nor house nor home. We have her alone, the richly-watered, richly-fruited, cool with delightful winds, rich with harvests—"

Then Mohendra understood and said, "Sing it again." Bhavananda sang once more.

Mother, I bow to thee!
Rich with thy hurrying streams,
Bright with thy orchard gleams,
Cool with thy winds of delight,
Dark fields waving, Mother of might,

Mother free.

Glory of moonlight dreams
Over thy beaches and lordly
streams;

Clad in thy blossoming trees,
Mother, giver of ease,
Laughing low and sweet!
Mother, I kiss thy feet,
Speaker sweet and low!
Mother, to thee I bow.

Who hath said thou art weak
in thy lands,

When the swords flash out in seventy million hands
And seventy million voices roar
Thy dreadful name from shore
to shore?

With many strengths who art
mighty and stored,
To thee I call, Mother and Lord!

Thou who savest, arise and save!
To her I cry who ever her foemen drove

Back from plain and sea
And shook herself free.

Thou art wisdom, thou art law,
Thou our heart, our soul, our breath,

Thou the love divine, the awe
In our hearts that conquers death.

Thine the strength that nerves
the arm,

Thine the beauty, thine the charm.

Every image made divine
In our temples is but thine.
Thou art Durga, Lady and Queen,

With her hands that strike and her swords of sheen,
Thou art Lakshmi lotus-throned,
And the Muse a hundred-toned.

Pure and perfect without peer,
Mother, lend thine ear.

Rich with thy hurrying streams,
Bright with thy orchard gleams,
Dark of hue, O candid-fair
In thy soul, with jewelled hair
And thy glorious smile divine,
Loveliest of all earthly lands,
Showering wealth from well-stored hands!

Mother, mother mine!
Mother sweet, I bow to thee
Mother great and free!

Translator's note. It is difficult to translate the National Anthem of Bengal into verse in another language owing to its unique union of sweetness, simple directness and high poetic force. All attempts in this direction have been failures. In order, therefore, to bring the reader unacquainted with Bengali nearer to the exact force of the original, I give the translation in prose line by line.

I bow to thee, Mother,
richly-watered, richly-fruited,
cool with the winds of the south, dark with the crops of the harvests,
the Mother!
her strands rejoicing in the glory of the moonlight, her lands clothed beautifully with her trees in flowering bloom, sweet of laughter, sweet of speech,
the Mother, giver of boons, giver of bliss!
Terrible with the clamorous shout of seventy million throats, and the sharpness of swords raised in twice seventy million hands
Who sayeth to thee, Mother, that thou art weak?
Holder of multitudinous strength,
I bow to her who saves, to her who drives from her the armies of her foemen,
the Mother!
Thou art knowledge, thou art conduct,
thou our heart, thou our soul,
for thou art the life in our body.
In the arm thou art might,
O Mother,
in the heart, O Mother thou art love and faith.
It is thy image we raise in every temple.
For thou art Durga holding her ten weapons of war, Kamala at play in the lotuses and Speech, the goddess, giver of all lore.
To thee I bow!
I bow to thee, goddess of wealth,
pure and peerless,
richly-watered, richly-fruited,
the Mother!
I bow to thee Mother
dark-hued, candid, sweetly smiling, jewelled and adorned,
the holder of wealth, the lady of plenty,
the Mother!

AN IMAGE.

Rushing from Troy like a cloud on the plains the Trojans thundered,
Just as a storm comes thundering thick with the dust of kingdoms,
Edged with the devious dance of the lightning, so all Troas Loud with the roar of the chariot, loud with the vaunt and the war-cry,
Rushed from Troywards gleaming with spears and rolled enormous.
Joyous as ever Paris led them glancing in armour, Brilliant with gold like a bridegroom, playing with death and battle
Even as in his chamber he played with beautiful Helen.
Touching her body rejoiced with low and lyrical laughter,
So he laughed as he smote his foemen. Round him the arrows, Round him the spears of the Argives sang like voices of maidens
Trilling the song of bridal bliss, the chant hymeneal:
Round him the warriors fell like flowers strewn at a bridal.
Red with the beauty of blood.

SWADESHI IN CALCUTTA

A Swadeshi meeting was held at College Square on Sunday at 3-30 p.m. Babu Debi Prasanna Roy Chowdhuri was to have presided over the meeting. But owing to his unavoidable absence the chair was taken by Babu Lalit Mohan Dasa, M.A. The meeting opened with the well-known national song "Amar Desh." First all, Babu Syam Lal Goswami delivered an impressive speech dwelling upon our Swadeshi work during the last four years. He observed that every one of us was bound by a sort of national obligation to show his deep and heartfelt respect to the deportees. The best means to show this respect to them is to preserve Swadeshim in tact remaining strictly within the bounds of law. He then referred to the injuries caused by the recent cyclone to the poorest inhabitants of Faridpur, Jessore, Khulna and Barisal and added that if the Government do not readily open their fund the calamities of those poor will know no bounds. He was followed by Pandit Gispati Kabyatirtha Next Babu Haridas Dutt delivered a speech in support of the Swadeshi and boycott. In summing up the President remarked that boycott was the foundation stone of Swadeshim. We must not give it up. The meeting then dissolved.

AHMEDABAD BOMB INCIDENT.

The "Advocate of India" commenting on the Ahmedabad bomb incident observes:—

"So far as we are able to judge there is absolutely nothing to connect it with the chain of recent crimes which disturbed other side of India and not a little evidence to suggest that is an outcome of any organised conspiracy of any kind. That it is serious enough that it has probably cost human life and that it might have been worse is quite undeniable as a particular act however inspired and with whatever motive, we would be the last to minimise it but we hope that until the facts are fully known no handle will be given to scaremongers who are always with us to turn this part of the country upside down and to fabricate conspiracies and plots which exist only in heated and fantastic imaginations. Until we have Bengal's justification for it and we believe there is no sign of it we have no desire to see this presidency overrun with colossal fabrications which accompanied actual wrong doing in Bengal. Within the bounds of possibility that crime has no reigen in the activity of Indian anarchists at all and that bombs were of firework type largely in use during the Dewali festival and quite capable, if carelessly handled of doing damage actually inflicted on an unfortunate bullock cart driver."

AGRA POLICE SUB-INSPECTOR'S CASE.

The case of Police Sub-Inspector. Gajadhar Pershad has now gone up for revision before the Sessions Judge of Agra. This Police officer, it is alleged, severely assaulted some Indian residents, men and women living in his circle, keeping them under wrongful confinement and attempting to extort money from them. It will be remembered that the accused was discharged by the Joint Magistrate of Agra. The revision was filed by R. G. S. Sharma Bar-at-law One of the grounds is that the Lower Court should have committed the case to the Court of Sessions when it held that the injuries had been caused by the police and that there was substratum of truth and that it was unable to sift the truth from exaggerated statement The case continues to excite the greatest interest.

A MYSORE APPOINTMENT.

A correspondent writes to the "Hindu" alleging that the Government of India, contrary to the policy of non-interference, which, the Viceroy said at Udaipur, they were following in regard to Natives States, have advised the Mysore Government that the appointment of Mr. Setlur K. A. L. B. as a Puisne Judge of the Chief Court of Mysore was not desirable. The correspondent goes on to say that the Government of India's reason for this appears to be that Mr. Setlur when practising as an advocate at Bombay edited a book entitled "The Trial of Tilak" and then too it is rumoured that the Bombay Political Department had in its possession a letter written by Mr. Setlur to Mr. Tilak expressing sympathy with his propaganda. The Editor in a footnote states that he believes the correspondent's information to be generally correct but adds that the letter in question was written to a Nationalist leader in Calcutta at the time of the Sanat Congress expressing disapproval of Extremist tactics. This letter fell into the hands of the C. I. D. at one of the Calcutta house searches and was subsequently filed as an exhibit in the Alipore Bomb case and read in Court by Mr. Norton.

A special inquiry is going on. Details of dacoity and enquiry are yet wanting.

ANOTHER SEDITION CASE AT LAHORE.

Ziaul Huq, editor and proprietor of the defunct Peshawar paper, it is said, has been charged under Sec. 124A for seditious printings in his paper. It is further said that one of Ajit Singh's books is an adaptation from Seeley's Explanation of England.

The hearing of Mr. Bhilde's case was resumed. Hon'ble Mr. Gokhale in cross-examination said, the political parties made appearance three years since the Extremists wanted to knock down the agitation in England and representation to the Government. In India the creed fixed the goal of Colonial Self-Government. The boycott resolution was dropped at Madras as the preamble of the resolution became useless by the Reform Scheme. The cross-examination is going on. The hearing will be resumed on the 22nd instant.

POLICE RAID AT LAHORE.

At the Lalchand Falakh Bande Matamm Book Agency the police captured and took away all copies of "Kaum Kistarah Zinda rathihai" or how nations are kept alive, "Sarkari mulazamat" or Government service, "quami talien" meaning national education. Lalchand's father applied for bail but the applicant was told by the District Magistrate to renew the application after the police had sent up the case. From Kishen Singh's house the police removed all copies of "Bandar Baut" meaning distribution by monkey, "Tahzebki Bezabtgi" meaning blemishes of European civilisation, "Bagi Masgih" meaning revolt of Christ, "Amanat me khiynat" meaning betrayal of trust, "Gadi" meaning mutiny, "Bhagabat" or revolutions, "Ungli pakaake pauncha pakra," meaning seizing wrist after holding fingers and photos of Tilak, countless swains, correspondence and manuscripts or unpublished writings of sun Anandprasad and Ajit Singh. A local paper says:—Kishen Singh, Ajit Singh's brother, went to the City Police Superintendent for surrendering himself, but was informed there was only a search warrant. Swaran Singh is said to be suffering from consumption. The house of Bawa Dhanpat Rai, pleader, Kasur and father-in-law of Ajit Singh was searched at Kasur and so also Ajit Singh's house near Lyalpur.

The household arrangements are thoroughly Indian with a native cook and waiters.

INDIANS IN BIRMINGHAM.

An unpleasant stir has been caused in Birmingham, says the correspondent of Daily News in that city, by the attitude adopted by the authorities towards coloured students at the university who are anxious to avail themselves of the military preparation afforded by the Officers' Training Corps. It is stated that two of the members of the Birmingham University contingent are Indians, and that by a War Office edict they have been disqualified from sitting for the examinations for commissions which are held in connection with the corps— "India."

VICEROY ATTACKED.

While the Viceroy and Lady Minto were driving from the station at Ahmedabad to Rani Spair's tomb, two missiles were hurled at the carriage, one from the dense crowd which lined the streets.

The Sergeant of the Lani-killen Dragoons who was riding on the left of the carriage cleverly knocked the first aside with his sword. The second hit the Viceroy's Jamadar who was holding an umbrella over Lady Minto on his wrist and fell to the ground.

Their Excellencies were quite unmoved and drove on to the tomb as if nothing had happened.

They completed the programme at Ahmedabad and afterwards entertained the local officials at lunch on their train.

A report was then received that a passer-by hand subsequently picked up one of the missiles which exploded and caused him serious injuries but the result of the investigation is not yet known.

INDIA IN PARLIAMENT.

THE CASE OF MR. LAJPAT RAI.

In the Commons, Dr. Rutherford asked the Under-Secretary for India whether he was aware that in the libel case of Lajpat Rai and the Daily Express the Secretary of State for India had deposed Mr. Lajpat Rai was used by the Judge in summing up to the jury, as a ground for mitigating the damages for the charges of sedition made against the plaintiff and not justified by the defendants, and whether the Secretary of State will make some amends to Mr. Lajpat Rai for the injustice done to him by deportation without charge or trial?

The Master of Elibank replied: "The Secretary of State finds no reason for taking any such action as is suggested in the question."

Mr. Mackarness: "Is it fair to Mr. Lajpat Rai that he should not know why he was deported?"

"I have repeatedly informed the Hon. Member," said the Master of Elibank, "what the policy of the Government with regard to deportation is rightly or wrongly it was decided not to inform him of the grounds of his deportation."

THE GHULAB BANOO CASE.

Dr. Rutherford asked the Under-Secretary whether he had any official knowledge that the Executive Government of the Punjab had published an opinion totally disagreeing with the judgments of Mr. Justice Robertson and Mr. Justice Rattigan with regard to the conduct of the police in the Ghulab Banoo case?

Master of Elibank replied in the affirmative, and added: "So far as the Secretary of State is aware the observations of the Judges on the resolution have neither been asked for nor offered."

Dr. Rutherford: Is that fair to the Judges?

The Master of Elibank: There is no reason to suppose that the Judges will be dissatisfied with the course which has been taken by the Indian Government.

Mr. Rees: Did not the Executive Government agree with the Judge who had the witnesses before him and was able to judge of the conduct of the witnesses under cross-examination?

This Master of Elibank: Yes, the Chief Court in their judgment did not find that the allegation of torture against the police were proved, but that on the evidence before them there was a case for enquiry. The Local Government accepted this view, and after holding an inquiry arrived at the same conclusion as to the facts as did the Sessions Judge and the Assessors.

Mr. Byles: Is the Hon. Gentleman aware that the Government have overruled the decision of the Judges?

The Master of Elibank: No, Sir.

Dr. Rutherford: Is not this action of the Executive a dangerous innovation destructive of the independence of the Law courts?

The Master of Elibank: No, Sir. It is quite the custom in India for the Executive Government to conduct an inquiry when they think it best to do so.

Mr. Mackarness: Will the Hon. gentleman answer the question I have put to him twice, namely, were the police witnesses cross-examined?

The Master of Elibank: I am not able to answer that, but the Punjab Government conducted the inquiry into the whole circumstances, and the Hon. member may rest assured that they acted in the best interests of justice and fairness.

NASIK SEDITION CASE.

APPEAL OF GANESH DAMODER SAVARKAR.

This morning on the Appellate Side of the Bombay High Court, the Hon. Mr. Justice Chandavarkar and the Hon. Mr. Justice Heaton resumed the hearing of the appeal preferred by Ganesh Damoder Savarkar, who, on the 9th June last, was convicted of sedition under Section 104A, and of attempting to wage war against the King under Section 121 of the Indian Penal Code, by Mr. B. C. Kennedy, I. C. S., Sessions Judge of Nasik, and was sentenced to two years' rigorous imprisonment on the first charge and to transportation for life on the second charge, both sentences to run concurrently, and was further ordered to forfeit all his property to the Government.

Mr. Joseph Baptista, representing the appellants, commented at length on the poems on which the Sessions Judge had convicted the accused. Mr. Baptista's interpretations were on several occasions questioned by Mr. Justice Chandavarkar. The judgment was reserved.

MIDNAPUR ENQUIRY.

Mr. Mackerness asked whether at the Midnapur inquiry held by the Commissioner, Mr. Macpherson, the public were admitted and all the witnesses were offered for cross-examination, and whether the Master of Elibank is in a position to state the conclusion come to by Mr. Macpherson.

The Master of Elibank replied: The Secretary of State has not yet received either Mr. Macpherson's report or the detailed information which he would require to answer the question.

Mr. Mackerness: "Is it a fact that the Superintendent and Chief Constable have been most seriously implicated by this inquiry and have been given long leave of absence?"

The Master of Elibank: "I think that does not arise out of the question."

ANTI-SEDITION PROCLAMATION.

Mr. Rees asked a question relating to the proclamations of the Maharaja of Jyampur and the Raja of Rewa against sedition.

The answer was that Lord Morley expected to receive official copies of these proclamations in due course. When they came the Master of Elibank would communicate with Mr. Rees.

THE DEPORTATIONS.

Mr. Mackerness asked whether, in view of the intention of the Government of India to deport agitators from their homes without charge or trial, the Master of Elibank would say if the advocates of the policy of tariff reform in India, known as Swadehi, are considered by the Government to be agitators and whether he would recommend the Government to issue some authoritative definition of the offence of agitation so that British subjects in India may protect themselves against the risk of deportation and imprisonment for unlimited period?

The Master of Elibank: "I am not aware what the hon. member means by 'intention,' nor what knowledge he has of the frame of mind of the Government of India. As was stated in a reply to a question on March 25th, no British subject in India runs away any risk of the nature indicated unless his conduct is such as to satisfy the Governor-General in Council that it is necessary to detain him in order to secure the British dominions from internal commotion. The Secretary of State is not prepared either himself to make or to order the Government of India to make any further statement by way of definition."

Mr. Mackerness: "May I ask the hon. gentleman whether he adheres to the declaration made by himself on Aug. 5th in this House that it was the intention of his Majesty's Government to remove from their sphere of operations all agitators?"

The Master of Elibank: "I did not say that. I said it was the intention of this country to maintain order, and if it was necessary agitators would have to be dealt with according to the law."

Mr. Rees: "May I ask whether the Pundits of the India Office endorse the translation of Swadehi as 'Tariff Reform'?"

Mr. Lupton: "It is not a fact that the chief charge against the men deported was that they were in favour of what is called Tariff-Reform?"

OPIUM IN ASSAM VALLEY.

The Master of Elibank, replying to Sir Herbert Roberts, admitted that the consumption of opium has increased of recent years in the Assam Valley districts and he quoted figures.

Sir H. Cotton: "Is the hon. gentleman aware that in the preceding six years when I had the honour of administering the Province, there was practically no increase in consumption?"

The Master of Elibank did not reply.

THE THANA "HINDU PUNCH" CASE,

THE JUDGMENT.

On Monday, 18th October, 1900, at Thana Mr. J. L. Bieu, District Magistrate, delivered his judgment in the rule calling on Krishnaji Kashinath Phadke, printer and publisher of the "Hindu Punch" and many other persons who might be concerned to appear before him to show cause why the conditional rule confiscating the paper should not be made absolute. Following is the full text of the judgment:—

The question for discussion is whether the conditional order issued by me under Sub-section (1) of Section 3 of Act VII of 1900 in respect of the printing press used for the printing and publishing of the Hindu Punch and all copies of this newspaper, shall be made absolute under sub-section (5) of the same Section. This involves the further question whether the Hindu Punch contains any incitement to murder or to act of violence.

The respondents appear in answer to the conditional order. They are Krishnaji Phadke who is the Printer and Publisher of the Hindu Punch, and Dhondo Kashinath Phadke, his brother, who is the Proprietor and Manager of the Arnodaya Press in Thana at which the Hindu Punch is printed. On their first appearance the respondents handed in written statements. In his statement Krishnaji Phadke declared his willingness to bind himself to discontinue the publication of the Hindu Punch and disclaimed any intention on his part that the newspaper should convey any incitement against Mr. Gokhale. Similarly Dhondo Phadke declared his readiness to undertake not to allow the further printing of the Hindu Punch by his press. Both respondents expressed regret for the appearance in the newspaper of matter which Government considered objectionable. Their pleader suggested that these undertakings should be accepted and the proceedings withdrawn. The act, however, provides no direction in the matter. The direction that if the Magistrate is satisfied that the newspaper contains matter of the nature specified in Sub-section (1) he 'shall' make the conditional order absolute, is imperative. Moreover, there would be no legal means of making the proposed undertakings binding on the respondents. I accordingly declined to consider the arrangement proposed.

In support of the order, copies of the issue of the Hindu Punch, dated the 17th March and 23rd August 1900, which contain the incriminatory articles worded "Namdar lost by a drop" and "is Namdar Shakar or Mazumdar?" have been put in together with the copies of the issues of the 21st and 28th July and the 10th August which contain a series of which that of the 23rd August forms part and of a cartoon appearing in the issue of the 18th August. Translations of these articles or of extracts have also been put in their correcters by vouched for by the assistant to the Oriental Translator to Government. The other articles of the series headed, "Is Nandur Shakar or Mazumdar?" and the cartoon are adduced merely and establishing the identity of Mr. Gokhale with "Nandur" but the point is not contested by the respondents.

The article headed "Nandur lost by a drop" bitterly reproaches Mr. Gokhale for his speech at the Madras Congress and declares the futility for the purpose of retrieving his lost reputation in the eyes of the "nationalist party" of his interpellations in Council on behalf of the Bengal deportees. It contains the following significant passage: "Do whatever you like but you have committed an unpardonable sin at Madras, and death is the only punishment for it. Those things will certainly not pass away from the minds of the people until you come to your natural end."

The article of the 25th August is the concluding one of the series in which Mr. Gokhale is held up to gross obloquy and bitter vilification for his alleged perfidy towards his country by his repudiation and denunciation of the methods of the extremist or "nationalist" party in his public speech recently delivered at Poona, his conduct and character being unfavourably compared with those of the notorious self-seeking Mazumdar and the clownish Shakar. In this article, which is a resume of the conclusions arrived at in the preceding ones, Mr. Gokhale is represented as causing "the cruel murder" of the extremist party by his vile accusations and false charges against them. As dealing blows from behind and in the dark, as being inspired by malice against his own people, as meanly endeavouring to get his co-sharer killed by another person and so appropriate the entire property to himself. He is compared with the traitor Nandu and declared by his speech to have committed 'infanticide,' namely, the murder of the young nation. Interspersed with all this vituperation and invective are injunctions to keep as far from such a person as possible, and disown him, and a statement that it is not possible to hear the blows dealt secretly and in the dark by men such as Mr. Gokhale, and that he will have to undergo to-day or to-morrow the same expiation which Ramshastri of the Peshwa's time prescribed to Raghoba Dada, viz, the sacrifice of his life. Finally, there occurs the following passage "It may perhaps be considered proper to wish long life to officials, nay every to tyrannical officials, under the British Raj. But we must with a full and swelling heart offer only this prayer to God: Take up and carry away at once this Nandur from amongst us, or at once throw him into the jaws of beasts of prey."

On behalf of the respondents it is contended in the first place but even granted that the articles contain an incitement to murder or the infliction of violence on Mr. Gokhale, the Act is not applicable to cases of incitement against a particular and specific individual which can be dealt with under the appropriate sections of the Penal Code. Its object, it is argued, is to prevent the dissemination of matter which advocates murder and acts of violence in the abstract by preaching that they are legitimate or commendable. But such a limitation of the scope of the Act is obviously inadmissible. If there is incitement to murder or to acts of violence, such incitement must necessarily be directed against a single individual or body or class of individuals or against humanity in general is immaterial so far as the question of the applicability of the Act is concerned.

The next contention is a denial that the articles in question contain any incitement to murder or to commit an act of violence on Mr. Gokhale. This is based on their interpretation as dealing exclusively with Mr. Gokhale's political entity of career and having no physical application to him. It is pointed out that throughout the articles such expressions as the "branding" of the nationalist party, "the striking of the breast," the attempt to "throw a noose" round the "neck" of the party are all used metaphorically and not literally and in the concrete and that therefore the references to the death of Mr. Gokhale, to the expiation which he must suffer etc, must also be given the same metaphorical interpretation. In the first article the expression "natural end" following immediately after the statement that death is the only punishment for Mr. Gokhale's offence, precludes the idea of a physical death. The Marathi word "Shasun" which has been rendered as punishment is capable of being applied to a self-inflicted punishment, an atonement in fact, and the meaning of the sentence is that Mr. Gokhale should give up all hopes of a further public career, that he should commit political suicide. In reference to his the expiation ordained or Raghoba Dada, viz. self-immolation supports this idea. The Marathi word rendered as expiation means a penance which is prescribed at the request of the sinner himself and inflicted by himself. The prayer for the removal of Mr. Gokhale for his physical annihilation but merely his retirement from the political arena, is addressed to God, not to man.

This ingenious interpretation may possibly apply to the first article which was written before Mr. Gokhale's utterances at Poona at a time when the writer had not the same motives for hatred of Mr. Gokhale as appear subsequently to have inspired him, but it is difficult to reconcile it with such expressions appearing in the in the latter article, written under the stress of very different emotions, as 'he will have to undergo to-day or to-morrow the very expiation' and 'throw him into the jaws of beasts of prey.' There is little in them which suggest or is even barely compatible with the idea of a voluntary withdrawal as a self-inflicted penance from the political scene.

I am not however concerned with the subtleties or mental reservations which the writer of the article may have had in his mind at the time he composed them. What I am concerned with is the question whether the articles are or are not an incitement to violence and in that respect

I have considered the effect which they are likely to produce on the minds of the public to whom they are addressed.

I have not the least hesitation in saying this effect must be one of very strong incitement to murder and violence. The writer is appealing to the members of the extremist, or as he prefers to call it, the nationalist party. Mr. Gokhale is held up to extermination as a traitor to that party, an enemy of his own people, a man who is "piercing with his nails the throat" of the young nation. He is warned that the time will come when he will have to expiate his crimes by the sacrifice of his life. It is improper to wish him a long life, but on the contrary God should be implored to remove him to wild beasts. A more potent incitement to murder and violence could not well be imagined.

I am satisfied, therefore, that the articles in Hindu Punch contain matter of the nature specified in Sub-section (1) of Section (3) of Act VII of 1908, and under Sub-section (5) of that Section I make my conditional order of forfeiture absolute.

The respondent Dhondo Kashinath Phadke has presented an application in which he states that only one machine and two frames of type are used for printing the Hindu Punch and prays that the order may be made in respect of those particular portions of his printing press only. I do not see how it is practicable to discriminate between particular portions of a press. It may be that the other portions of the press could not be used for printing the paper without introducing certain modifications in its size and appearance, but this would not be a bar to its production by the press which is the object of this preventive measure. I cannot, therefore, entertain the application. The order of forfeiture will extend so the whole of the printing plant and material of the Arunodaya Press by which the Hindu Punch has been declared by its Publisher under the Press and Registration of Books Act, 1887, to be printed and to all copies of that newspaper, wherever.

BRAHMACHARYA

The seed and soul of STUDENT LIFE: The true builder of the Nation.

BY
Sri. REMESH CHANDRA CHAKRAVARTY.

English Edition, bound Re. 1.

THE THEOSOPHIST (conducted by Col.
H. S. OLCOTT, P. T. S.), Madras:—"An excellent publication deserves to be in the hands of every Hindu student who neglects
his religion."

THE GUJARATI PUNCH (Ahmedabad):—"In this book are collected the several rules laid down by the Rishis of old to be observed by every Brahmachari. No greater service is rendered to a country than the one which teaches the formation of individual character in the youth of the country. Efforts in the direction of bringing up the posterity in a way that would elevate their mental position which would ultimately work up the way to bring back
the country to its good old position are not less needed than Congresses and Conferences.
The book should be in the hands of every student."

THE HINDU ORGAN, (Jaffna, Ceylon)—
"Brahmacharyya describes the life which Brahmachari ought to live. It contains the pith of the rules laid down by learned Rishis of the past for the promotion of the physical, intellectual and spiritual culture students. The changes which the altered conditions of present-day-life require are carefully noted. The book is in its structure Hindu, but the rules given in it are such as appeal to the common experience of all mankind."

From THE HON'BLE JUSTICE SIR S. SUB-
RAMANIAM IYER, K. C. I. E., Vice-Chancellor, Madras University. "I have no doubt it would be of the greatest use to those who are anxious to obtain a rational understanding of our institutions in their purity. I shall place the book very soon in the hands of the younger members of my family."

FACTS AND OPINIONS.

The Bomb Case and Anglo-India.

The comments of the Anglo-Indian papers on the result of the appeal in the Alipur case are neither particularly edifying nor do they tend to remove the impression shared by us with many thoughtful Englishmen that the imperial race is being seriously demoralized by empire. From the Englishman we expect nothing better, and in fact we were agreeably surprised at the comparative harmlessness of its triumphant article on the day after the judgment. Its reference to the nonsense about there being no sedition in India and no party of Revolution leaves our withers unwrung. We ourselves belong to a party of peaceful revolution, for it is a rapid revolution in the system of Government in India which is the aim of our political efforts, and it is idle to object to us that there have been no peaceful revolutions and cannot be. History gives the lie to that statement, whether it proceeds from Mr. Gokhale or from Anglo-India. We have also always admitted that there is a Terrorist party, for bombs are not thrown without hands and men are not shot for political reasons unless there is Terrorism in the background. All we have contended,—and our contention is not overthrown by the judgment in the Alipur appeal, which merely proves that the conspiracy was not childish, and by no means that it was a big or widespread organisation,—is that the attempt of the Anglo-Indian papers to blacken the whole movement, and especially the whole Nationalist party, is either an erroneous or an unscrupulous attempt, and the disposition of the police to arrest every young Swadeshi worker as a rebel and a dacoit is foolish, wrong-headed, often dishonest, and may easily become fatal to the chances of a peaceful solution of the dispute between the Government and the people. The Englishman, however, represents a lower grade of intellect and refinement to which these considerations are not likely to present themselves. The average respectable Englishman is better represented by the Statesman, and the one dominating note in the Statesman is that of regret that the Courts had to go through the ordinary procedure of the law and could not effect a swift dramatic and terror-striking vindication of the inviolability of the British Government. One would have thought that a nation with the legal and political traditions of the English people would have been glad that the procedure of law had been preserved, the chances of error minimised and the State still safeguarded; and that no ground had been given for a charge of differentiating between a political and an ordinary trial to the prejudice of the accused. It is evident, however, that the type of Englishman demoralized by empire and absolute power considers that, in political cases, the Law Courts should not occupy themselves with finding out the truth, but be used as a political instrument for vengeance and striking terror into political opponents.

The Nadiya President's Speech.

We congratulate Mr. Aswini Banerji on the able and vigorous speech delivered by him as the President of the Nadiya Conference. He took up an attitude which was at once manly and free from excess or violence. For ourselves the first point we turned to was the pronouncement on the Reform. We do not think the judgment of the country on this ill-conceived measure could have been put with greater truth and force than in the periods of goodhumoured contempt and irony, scathing yet in perfectly good taste, in which Mr. Banerji disposed of the claims of the Reform Scheme to be a measure of popular self-government. If all public men take the same attitude, the day of a true measure of popular control will be much nearer than if we affect a qualified satisfaction with this political bauble. As Mr. Banerji forcibly pointed out, it does not provide for a popular electorate, it does not admit of the election of popular leaders, it does not create a non-Government majority, or, as we would add, even the reasonable possibility of a strong opposition on essential points. What has the country do to do with a reformed Council stripped of these essentials? The job-shirkers, the self-seekers, the nonentities who wish to take advantage of the exclusion of distinguished and leading names in order to enjoy at the expense of the country's interests, the kudos and substantial advantages of a seat on the Councils will scramble for the newly-created heaven; that is the kind of co-operation which the Government will get from the non-Mussulman part of the nation under this scheme. The country remains sullen and dissatisfied.

Mr Macdonald's visit.

The tour undertaken by Mr Ramsay Macdonald in India has been cut short by the call from England summoning him home to take his part in the great struggle which is the beginning of the end of Conservative and semi-aristocratic England. In the peaceful revolution which that struggle presages and in which it must sooner or later culminate, Mr Macdonald's party stands to be the final winners. It is the semi-Socialistic Radical element in the Ministry attracted toward the Labour party to which the precipitation of this inevitable struggle is due. The Labour party is now predominatingly Socialistic and is purging itself of the old individualistic leaven which looked forward to no higher ideal than an eight hours day, Old Age pensions and Trade Union politics. The Labour members, Messrs Burt and Fenwick, who represent this old-world element, have received notice to quit from the Labour organisations which helped them into Parliament and much nonsense of a kind familiar to the progress of their lifelong supporters by fighting the representatives of the new aspirations in the interests of a middle class-party. Mr Macdonald belongs to the new thought, but he is, we believe, one of those who would hasten slowly to the goal. He has not the rugged personality of Mr Keir Hardie, but combines in himself, in a way Mr Hardie scarcely does, the old culture and the new spirit. He has as broad a sympathy and as penetrating an intelligence as Mr Nevins, but not the latter's quick intensity. Nevertheless, behind the slow consideration and calm thoughtfulness of his manner, one detects hidden iron and the concealed roughness of the force that has come to destroy and to build, some hint of the rugged outlines of Demogorgon, the claws of Narasingha. For every man is not only himself, he is that which he represents. Mr Macdonald has been reserved and cautious during his visit and has spoken out only on the Reforms and Reuter, nor have his remarks on these subjects passed the limits of what any sincere Liberal would hold to be a moderate statement of the truth. Mr Macdonald is one who does not speak out the whole of himself, he is a politician born, and born politicians do not care to outpace by too great a stride the speedily accomplishable fact. Whatever wider vistas they may see beyond, they prefer to move steadily towards them rather than to speak of them. So far as an Englishman can help India, and that under present circumstances is hardly at all, he certainly wishes to help. It is not his fault that the blindness of his countrymen and the conditions of the problem in India make men like him, perforce, little better than sympathetic spectators of the passionate struggle between established privilege and a nation in the making that the world watches now in India.

STEAD AND THE SPIRITS.

—oOo—

Considerable attention has been attracted and excitement created by the latest development of Mr. W. T. Stead's agency for communicating with spirits which he calls Julia's Bureau. The supposed communications of Mr. Gladstone, Lord Beaconsfield and other distinguished politicians on the question of the Budget have awakened much curiosity, ridicule and even indignation. The ubiquitous eloquence of Lord Curzon has been set flowing by what he considers this unscrupulous method of pressing the august departed into the ranks of Liberal electioneering agents, and he has penned an indignant letter to the papers in which there is much ornate Curzonian twaddle about sacred mysteries and the sanctities of the grave. If there is anything at all in the alleged communications from departed souls which have become of increasing interest to the European world, it ought to be fairly established that the grave is nothing but a hole in the earth containing a rotting piece of matter with which the spirit has no farther connection, and that the spirit is very much the same after death as before, takes much interest in small, trivial and mundane matters and is very far from regarding his new existence as a solemn sacred and mysterious affair. If so, we do not see why we either should approach the departed spirit with long and serious faces or with any more unusual feelings than curiosity, interest and eagerness to acquire knowledge of the other world and communication with those we knew and loved in this, in fact, the ordinary human and earthly feelings existing between souls sundered by time and space, but still capable of communication. But Lord Curzon still seems to be labouring under the crude Christian conception of the blessed dead as angels harping in heaven whose spotless plumes ought not to be roughly disturbed by human breath and of spiritual communication as a sort of necromancy, the spirit of Mr. Gladstone being summoned from his earthly bed and getting into it again and tucking himself up comfortably in his coffin after Julia and Mr. Stead have done with him. We should have thought that in the bold and innovating mind of India's only Viceroy these coarse European superstitions ought to have been destroyed long ago.

It is not however, Lord Curzon but Mr. Stead and the spirits with whom we have to deal. We know Mr. Stead as a pushing and original journalist, not always over refined or delicate either in his actions or expressions, skilful in the advertisement of his views, excitable, earnest, declamatory, loud and even hysterical, if you will, in some of his methods, but certainly neither a liar nor a swindler. He does and says what he believes and nothing else. It is impossible to dismiss his Bureau as an imposture or mere journalistic reclame. It is impossible to dismiss the phenomena of spirit communications, even with all the imposture that unscrupulous moneymakers have imported into them, as unreal or a deception. All that can reasonably be said is that their true nature has not yet been established beyond dispute. There are two conceivable explanations, one that of actual spirit communication, the other that of vigorously dramatised imaginary conversations jointly composed with wonderful skill and consistency by the subconscious minds, whatever that may be, of the persons present, the medium being the chief dramaturge of this subconscious literary Committee. This theory is so wildly improbable and so obviously opposed to the nature of the phenomena themselves, that only an obstinate unwillingness to admit new facts and ideas can explain its survival, although it was natural and justifiable in the first stages of investigation. There remains the explanation of actual spirit communication. But even when we have decided on this hypothesis as the base of our investigation, we have to be on our guard against a multitude of errors; for the communications are vitiated first by the errors and self-deceptions of the medium and the sitters, then by the errors and self-deceptions of the communicant spirits, and, worst of all, by deliberate deceit, lies and jugglery on the part of the visitants from the other world. The element of deceit and jugglery on the part of the medium and his helpers is not always small, but can easily be got rid of. Cheap scepticism and cheaper ridicule in such matters is only useful for comforting small brains and weak imaginations with a sense of superiority to the larger minds who do not refuse to enquire into phenomena which are at least widespread and of a consistently regular character. The true attitude is to examine carefully the nature of the phenomena, the conditions that now detract from their value and the possibility of removing them and providing perfect experimental conditions which would enable us to arrive at a satisfactory scientific result. Until the value of the communications are scientifically established, any attempt to use them for utilitarian, theatrical or yet lighter purposes is to be deprecated, as such misuse may end in shutting a wide door to potential knowledge upon humanity.

From this point of view Mr. Stead's bizarre experiments are to be deprecated. The one redeeming feature about them is that, as conducted, they seem to remove the first elementary difficulty in the way of investigation, the possibility of human deceit and imposture. We presume that he has got rid of professional mediums and allows only earnest-minded and honourable investigators to be present. But the other elements of error and confusion are encouraged rather than obviated by the spirit and methods of Mr. Stead's Bureau. First, there is the error and self-deception of the sitters. The spirit does not express himself directly but has to give his thoughts at third hand; they come first to the intermediary spirit, Julia or another, by her they are conveyed to the human medium and through him conveyed by automatic or conscious speech or writing to the listeners. It is obvious how largely the mind of the medium and, to a smaller but still great extent, the thought-impressions of the other sitters must interfere, and this without the least intention on their part, rather in spite of a strong wish in the opposite direction. Few men really understand how the human mind works or are fitted to watch the processes of their own conscious and half-conscious thought even when the mind is disinterested, still less when it is active and interested in the subject of communication. The sitters interfere, first, by putting in their own thoughts and expressions suggested by the beginnings of the communication, so that what began as a spirit conversation ends in a tangle of the medium's or sitters' ideas with the little of his own that the spirit can get in now and then. They interfere not only by suggesting what they themselves think or would say on the subject, but by suggesting what they think the spirit ought dramatically to think or say, so that Mr. Gladstone is made to talk in interminable cloudy and circumambient periods which were certainly his oratorical style but can hardly have been the staple of his conversation, and Lord Beaconsfield is obliged to be cynical and immoral in the tone of his observations. They interfere again by eagerness, which sometimes produces replies according to the sitters' wishes and sometimes others which are unpleasant or alarming, but in neither case reliable. This is especially the case in answers about the future, which ought never to be asked. It is true that many astonishing predictions occur which are perfectly accurate, but these are far outweighed by the mass of false and random prediction. These difficulties can only be avoided by rigidly excluding every question accompanied by or likely to raise eagerness or expectation and by cultivating entire mental passivity. The last however is impossible to the medium unless he is a practised Yogin, or in a trance, or a medium who has attained the habit of passivity by an unconscious development due to long practice. In the sitters we do not see how it is to be induced. Still, without unmotional indifference to the nature of the answer and mental passivity the conditions for so difficult and delicate a process of communication cannot be perfect.

Error and self-deception from the other side of the veil cannot be obviated by any effort on this side, all that we can do is to recognise that the spirits are limited in knowledge and cabined by character, so that we have to allow for the mental and moral equation in the communicant when judging the truth and value of the communication. Absolute deception and falsehood can only be avoided by declining to communicate with spirits of a lower order and being on guard against their masquerading under familiar or distinguished names. How far Mr. Stead and his circle have guarded against these latter errors we cannot say, but the spirit in which the sittings are conducted, does not encourage us to suppose that scrupulous care is taken in these respects. It is quite possible that some playful spirit has been enacting Mr Gladstone to the too enthusiastic circle and has amused himself by elaborating those cloudy-luminous periods which he saw the sitters expected from the great deceased Opportunist. But we incline to the view that what we have got in this now famous spirit interview, is a small quantity of Gladstone, a great deal of Stead and a fair measure of the disembodied Julia and the assistant psychics.

THE ALIPUR JUDGMENT.

The judgment of the Appeal Court in the Alipur Case has resulted in the reduction of sentences to a greater or less extent in all but two notable instances, and on the other hand, the maintenance of the finding of the Lower Court in all but six cases, on five of which there is a difference of opinion between the Chief Justice and Justice Carnduff. So long as these cases are still subjudice, we reserve our general comments on the trial. At present we can only offer a few remarks on special features of the judgment. The acquittal of the Maratha, Hari Balkrishna Kane, must give universal satisfaction, as his conviction in the absence of any evidence in the least establishing his guilt would have been a gross miscarriage of justice. The rejection of Section 121 and the consequent elimination of the death sentences, is also a result on which the Government and the country may both be congratulated. Even in the case of actual political assassins the infliction of the death sentences, however legally justifiable, is bad policy. Death sentences for political crimes only provide martyrs to a revolutionary cause, nerve the violent to fresh acts of vengeance and terrorism, and create through the liberation of the spirits of the dead men a psychical force making for further unrest and those passions of political revolt and fierceness to which they were attached in life. The prolongation of terrorism is undesirable in the interests of the country; for, so long as young men are attached to these methods of violence, the efforts of a more orderly though not less strenuous Nationalism to organise and spread itself must be seriously hampered. We are glad to note that the Chief Justice has in no case condemned an accused on the evidence of the watch-witnesses alone. Such evidence is always suspect in the eyes of the people of this country and the gross blunders, if they were no worse, committed by several of the police witnesses in this case deprive their identifications of all evidential value. Once the confessions were admitted as entirely voluntary and entirely true, the fate of the confessing prisoners and of those directly implicated by them as active members of the society was a foregone conclusion. The conviction of an accused on such a serious charge when there is no clear incriminating evidence against him except the confessions of others, is no doubt permissible under ordinary jurisprudence when these confessions create a moral certainty in the mind of the judge; but if this rule sometimes prevents the escape of the guilty, it not seldom lends itself to the punishment of the innocent. Of more importance, however, and the one serious flaw we are disposed to find in the Chief Justice's judgment, is the exaggerated importance attached to familiarity and intimacy between the leaders of the conspiracy and those whose guilt was open to doubt. When there is a secret conspiracy, it is inevitable that there should be numbers of men intimately associated with the members, perhaps even co-operating with them in surface political action, who are yet in entire ignorance of the close and dangerous proceedings of their friends. It was a recognition of this obvious fact that largely governed Mr. Beachcroft's findings; but we cannot help feeling that neither he nor the Appeal Court, ignorant, like all Englishmen, of the actual workings of the National Movement, have given sufficient weight to this consideration. As a result, the benefit of the doubt has not been extended where it should have been extended. Already it was a general conviction in the public mind that one innocent man had been convicted and succumbed to the rigours of jail life, while two are hopelessly condemned to the brutal and brutifying punishments by which European society avenges itself on the breakers of its laws,—we refer to the Kabiraj brothers found by Mr Beachcroft to be innocent of conspiracy and therefore presumably innocent tools of conspirators. There is an uneasy sense that some at least have been added to the list by the judgment in appeal. Even if it be so, however, the judges have done their best, and the European legal system has always been a lottery by which it is easy, without any fault on the part of the judge, for the guilty to escape and the innocent to suffer. It is perhaps one of the necessary risks of joining in Nationalist movements to be liable to be confounded in one fate with secret conspirators who happen to be associates in social or legitimate political relations, and when the C. I. D. throws its nets with a generous wideness, we ought not to whine if such accidents bring us into the meshes. The State must be preserved at any cost. In any case, the whole country must be grateful to Sir Lawrence Jenkins for the courtesy, patience and fairness with which he has heard the case and given every facility to the defence, an attitude which might with advantage be copied by certain civilian judges in and outside the High Court and even by certain Judges, not civilians, in other provinces.

THE NATIONAL VALUE OF ART.

II

The activity of human thought divides itself broadly into two groups of functions, those of the right hand, contemplation, creation, imagination, the centres that see the truth, and those of the left hand, criticism, reasoning discrimination, inquiry, the centres that judge the truth when it is seen. In education the latter are fostered by scientific and manual training, but the only quality of the right hand that this education fosters is observation. For this reason a purely scientific education tends to make a man keen and clear-sighted within certain limits, but narrow, hard and cold. Even in his own sphere the man without the training of the right hand can only progress in a settled groove; he cannot broaden the base of human culture or enlarge the bounds of science. Tennyson describes him as an eye well practised in Nature, a spirit bounded and poor, and the description is just. But a cultivated eye without a cultivated spirit makes by no means the highest type of man. It is precisely the cultivation of the spirit that is the object of what is well called a liberal education, and the pursuits best calculated to cultivate the growth of the spirit are language, literature, the Arts, music, painting, sculpture or the study of these, philosophy, religion, history, the study and understanding of man through his works and of Nature and man through the interpretative as well as through the analytic faculties. These are the pursuits which belong to the intellectual activities of the right hand and while the importance of most of these will be acknowledged, there is a tendency to ignore Art and poetry as mere refinements, luxuries of the rich and leisurely rather than things that are necessary to the mass of men or useful to life. This is largely due to the misuse of these great instruments by the luxurious few who held the world and its good things in their hands in the intermediate period of human progress. But the aesthetic faculties entering into the enjoyment of the world and the satisfaction of the vital instincts, the love of the beautiful in men and women, in food, in things, in articles of use and articles of pleasure, have done more than anything else to raise man from the beast, to refine and purge his passions, to ennoble his emotions and to lead him up through the heart and the imaginations to the state of the intellectual man. That which has helped man upward, must be preserved in order that he may not sink below the level he has attained. For man intellectually developed, mighty in scientific knowledge and the mastery of gross and subtle Nature, using the elements as his servants and the world as his footstool, but undeveloped in heart and spirit, becomes only an inferior kind of Asura using the powers of a demigod to satisfy the nature of an animal. According to our traditions and memories of the old world, of such a nature was the civilisation of old Atlantis, submerged beneath the Ocean when its gentleness and its wickedness became too heavy a load to the earth to bear, and our own legends of the Asuras represent a similar consciousness of a great but abortive development in humanity.

The first and lowest use of Art is the purely aesthetic, the second is the intellectual or educative, the third and highest the spiritual. By speaking of the aesthetic use as the lowest, we do not wish to imply that it is not of immense value to humanity, but simply to assign to it its comparative value in relation to the higher uses. The aesthetic is of immense importance and until it has done its work, mankind is not really fitted to make full use of Art on the higher planes of human development. Aristotle assigns a high value to tragedy because of its purifying force. He describes its effect as katharsis, a sacramental word of the Greek mysteries which in the secret discipline of the ancient Greek Tantries, answered precisely to our chittasuddhi, the purification of the chitta or mass of established ideas, feelings and actional habits in a man either by saunyama, rejection, or by bhoga, satisfaction, or by both. Aristotle was speaking of the purification of dangerous passions and emotions in the heart through imaginative satisfaction in poetry but the truth his idea contains is of much wider application and constitutes the justification of the aesthetic side of art. It purifies by beauty. The beautiful and the good are held by many thinkers to be the same and, though the idea may be wrongly stated, it is, when put from the right standpoint, not only a truth but the fundamental truth of existence. According to our own philosophy the whole world came out of ananda and returns into ananda, and the tripple term in which ananda may be stated is Joy, Love, Beauty. To see divine beauty in the whole world, man, life, nature, to love that which we have seen and to have pure unalloyed bliss in that love and that beauty is the appointed road by which mankind as a race must climb to God. That is the reaching to Vidya through Avidya, to the One Pure and Divine through the manifold manifestation of Him, of which the Upanishad repeatedly speaks. But the bliss must be pure and unalloyed, unalloyed by felt-rearings, emotions, unalloyed by pain and evil. The sense of good and bad, beautiful and unbeautiful which afflicts our understanding and our senses, must be replaced by akhanda rasa, undifferentiated and unbridged delight in the delightfulness of things, before the highest can be reached. On the way to this goal full use must be made of the lower and abridged sense of beauty which seeks to replace the less beautiful by the more, the lower by the higher, the mean by the noble.

At a certain stage of human development the aesthetic sense is of infinite value in this direction. It raises and purifies conduct by instilling a distaste for the coarse desires and passions of the savage, for the rough, uncouth and excessive in action and manner, and restraining both feeling and action by a striving after the decent, the beautiful, the fit and the only which received its highest expression in the manners of cultivated European society, the elaborate ceremonious life of the Caste system, the careful achar and etiquette of Hinduism. At the present stage of progress this element is losing much of its once all important value and, when over-stressed tends to hamper a higher development by the obstruction of soulless ceremony and formalism. Its great use was to discipline the savage animal instincts of the body, the vital instincts and the lower feelings in the heart. Its disadvantage to progress is that it tends to trammel the play both of the higher feelings of the heart and the workings of originality in thought. Born originally of a seeking after beauty, it degenerates into an attachment to form, to exterior uniformity, to precedent, to dead authority. In the future development of humanity it must be given a much lower place than in the past. Its limits must be recognized and the demands of a higher truth, sincerity and freedom of thought and feeling must be given priority. Mankind is apt to bind itself by attachment to the means of its past progress forgetful of the aim. The bondage to formulas has to be outgrown and in this again it is the sense of a higher beauty and fitness which will be most powerful to correct the lower. The art of life must be understood in more magnificent terms and must subordinate its more formal elements to the service of the master civilizers, Love and Thought.

ANANDAMATH.

CHAPTER X.

Mohendra saw the robber as he sang the dithyrambs. In wonder he asked "Who are you?" Bhavananda replied "We are the Children."

"What is meant by the Children?" asked Mohendra. "Whose children are you?"

Bhavananda replied, "The children of the Mother."

"Good," said Mohendra, "Do the children worship their mother with theft and looting? What kind of filial piety is that?"

"We do not thieve and loot," answered Bhavananda.

"Why, just now you plundered the carts."

"Is that theft and looting? Whose money did we plunder?"

"Why, the ruler's."

"The ruler's! What right has he to the money, that he should take it?"

"It is his royal share of the wealth of the country."

"Who rules and does not protect his kingdom, is he a ruler at all?"

"I see you will be blown one day from the cannon's mouth by the sepoys."

"I have seen your rascal sepoys more than once; I dealt with some to-day too."

"Oh, that was not a real experience of them; one day you will get it."

"Suppose it is so, a man can only die once."

"But what profit is there in going out of one's way to die?"

"Mohendra Singha," said Bhavananda, "I had a kind of idea that you were a man worth the name, but now I see you are what all the rest of them are, merely the death of ghee and milk. Look you, the snake crawls on the ground and is the lowest of living things, but put your foot on the snake's neck and even he will rise with lifted hood. Can nothing overthrow your patience then? Look at all the countries you know, Magadh, Mithila, Kashi, Kanchi, Delhi, Cashmere, in what other country do men from starvation eat grass? eat thorns? eat the earth white ants have gathered? eat the creepers of the forest? where else are men forced to eat dogs and jackals, yes, even the bodies of the dead? where else can men have no ease of heart because of fear for the money in their chests, the household gods on their sacred seats, the young women in their homes, the unborn children in the women's wombs? Ay, here they rip open the womb and tear out the child. In every country the relation with the ruler is that of protector and protected, but what protection do our Mussulman rulers give us? Our religion is destroyed, our caste defiled, our honour polluted, our family honor shamed and now our very lives are going the same way. Unless we drive out these vice-besodden longbeards, the Hinduism of the Hindu is doomed."

"How will you drive them out?" asked Mohendra.

"By blows."

"You will drive them out single handed? With one slap, I suppose."

The robber sang:

"Who hath said thou art weak
in thy lands,

When the swords flash out in
seventy million hands

And seventy million voices roar
Thy dreadful name from shore
to shore?"

"But," said Mohendra, "I see you are alone."

"Why, just now you saw two hundred men."

"Are they all Children?"

"They are all Children."

"How many more are there of them?"

"Thousands like these, and by degrees there will be yet more."

"Even if there were ten or twenty thousand, will you be able with that number to take the throne from the Mussulman?"

"What army had the English at Plassey?"

"Can Englishmen and Bengalees be compared?"

"Why not? What does physical strength matter? Greater physical strength will not make the bullet fly farther."

"Then," asked Mohendra, "why is there such a difference between an Englishman and a Mussulman?"

"Take this first," said Bhavananda, "an Englishman will not run away even from the certainty of death. A Mussulman runs as soon as he perspires and roams in search of a glass of sherbet. Next take this, that the Englishman has tenacity. If he takes up a thing, he carries it through. Don't care, is a Mussulman's motto. He is giving his life for a hire, and yet the soldiers don't get their pay. Then the last thing is courage. A cannon ball can fall only in one place, not in ten; so there is no necessity for two hundred men to run from one cannon ball. But one cannon ball will send a Mussulman with his whole clan running, while a whole clan of cannon balls will not put even a solitary Englishman to flight."

"Have you all these virtues," asked Mohendra.

"No," said Bhavananda, "but virtues don't fall from the nearest tree. You have to practise them."

"Do you practise them?"

"Do you not see we are sannyasins? It is for this practice that we have made renunciation. When our work is done, when our training is complete, we shall again become householders. We also have wives and daughters."

"You have abandoned all these ties, but have you been able to overcome Maya?"

"The Children are not allowed to speak falsely and I will not make a lying boast to you. Who has the strength to conquer Maya? When a man says, 'I have conquered Maya' either he never had any feeling or he is making a vain boast. We have not conquered Maya, we are only keeping our vow. Will you be one of the Children?"

"Until I get news of my wife and daughter, I can not say anything."

The two went on their way; and Bhavananda began again to sing Bande Matarani.

Mohendra had a good voice and was a little proficient in singing and fond of it; therefore he joined in the song, and found that as he sang the tears came into his eyes. Then Mohendra said, "If I have not to abandon my wife and daughter, then initiate me into this vow."

"Whoever" answered Bhavananda, "takes this vow, must abandon wife and child. If you take this vow, you cannot be allowed to meet your wife and daughter. Suitable arrangements will be made for their protection, but until the vow is crowned with success, to look upon their faces is forbidden."

"I will not take your vow," answered Mohendra.

ALIPUR BOMB CASE.

SENTENCES REDUCED. ONE ACQUITTED.

At the High Court on Tuesday their Lordship the Chief Justice and Mr. Justice Carnduff delivered judgment in the well-known Alipur Bomb Case appeals. After dealing with the sentences that was meted out to the appellants in the lower court and a careful perusal of the general facts of the case His Lordship stated that:—

In support of the appeals the appellants had urged that the convictions were bad in law and further that they were not justified by the evidence on record. All the arguments had been carefully considered and weighed. Several legal objections had been advanced against the appeals now under consideration. Objection had been taken that Barindra being a European British subject, the Magistrate was bound to commit him to the High Court; and that the rest of the accused should have been similarly committed in compliance with the provisions of Section 452. It was admitted that Barindra was a European British subject, but it was contended that he had waived his right as such. His Lordship held that the first four points raised had been covered by the decision of this court in the case of King against Kyros. In the light of the decision His Lordship was of opinion that Barin had relinquished his right to be tried as a European British subject and on the facts of the case His Lordship held that Barindra did actually relinquish that right and that the Court of Sessions had completed jurisdiction to dispose of the case.

It was next argued that there was no jurisdiction to take cognisance of the different sections under which the accused had been convicted, namely, Sections 121, 121 A and 122 of the Indian Penal Code. The authority in this case had come from the Local Government. After reading that authority His Lordship said that on the 16th May, a complaint was presented in the form of an allegation made in writing to Mr. Birely and after giving the names of the appellants mentioned in the first batch Inspector Purna Chandra Biswas submitted a complaint charging the members of the Secret Society under various sections which included Sections 121, 121A and 122. On that very day Purna Chandra Biswas was examined and he stated in his complaint as well as personally that permission had been given to him by the Government of Bengal to prosecute certain persons under certain sections which included Sections 121, 122A, 122, 123 and 1241, P. C. After stating his complaint Biswas proceeded to state that those persons well engaged in conspiring to wage war against the Government. On the strength of his order or complaint the Magistrate committed these appellants to the Court of Sessions for trial for offences under Sections 121, 121A, and 122 of the Indian Penal Code.

Two points arose in the connection. The first was a complaint under section 21 authorized by the Local Government and the second was a complaint in fact lodged under that Section. The question whether action could be taken under Chapter VI was more than a matter of law. The sanction of the Local Government should be specifically directed to particular section of Chapter VI and the order or authority should be preceded by a deliberate determination that proceedings should be taken in respect of a particular section of the Chapter and no other. His Lordship would hesitate to take a view of this Chapter which would give Government the discretion to entrust Section or the sections under which a prosecution should be undertaken to the zeal of an advocate. This order was passed on the 17th of May. At that time of the most prominent of the persons arrested had made their confessions. Although the Local Government had not before it all the details of the evidence afterwards adduced, it must have been aware of the facts on which reliance was now placed as regards the charge under section 121, and yet the order did not recite that section. Then again the notice or authority to complain did not mention section 121 but only those sections specified in the recital. Could it under the circumstances contend that a true reading of the order was that it was intended to cover section 121? His Lordship thought not. He could not read the recital to the order without coming to the conclusion that it had not been made to appear to His Honor the Lieutenant-Governor, that there was reason to believe that an offence had been committed under section 121, nor could His Lordship suppose that this view was not the result of careful deliberation. The order wound up with the words "or any other section of the said code, which may be found applicable to the said case." But order by whom? If it meant any one other than the Government, it involved a delegation of power, which could not be sustained. Mr. Norton had stated that he was instructed to state that it was not the intention of the Government to argue that section 121, was included in the order. Under the circumstances his Lordship held that the order of the 17th May did not authorize a complaint under section 121 of the I. P. C.

Mr. Norton had been argued that any defect in the complaint had been covered by an order by the Local Government when the case was under trial in the lower Court. It was clear that the so-called sanction was absolutely valueless. Finally it was argued that any defect in the commitment was cured by section 532 and reliance was placed on the cases of Queen vs. Norton and Queen against Tilak. His Lordship then briefly referred to the two cases and remarked that in the present there had been a want of jurisdiction not only by the Magistrate but in the Court of Sessions. At no stage of the case had the provisions of section 196 been satisfied. The result was that the Court of Sessions had no jurisdiction to convict the first batch under section 121. His Lordship however thought it right to add that the conviction under Section 121 did not fail merely on the lack of jurisdiction. On merit also there was no evidence that the offence charged under that had been proved. His Lordship therefore held that the charge under section 121 could not be sustained. Hence, a charge could not be sustained. He also objected that he was not allowed to cross-examine the witnesses to the ground. His Lordship also held that the objection to the procedure on the ground of misjoinder of the parties was not well founded and must fail.

His Lordship then dealing with the merits said that before discussing with the detail of the individual cases, he would first deal with the objection that the confessions were not admissible. The involved a question Mr Birley purported to record the confessions under section 164 of the Criminal Procedure Code. It was urged that the confessions did not come within the terms of section 161 and that there was no other section of the Code under which they could be brought. For the law relating to confessions they must first turn to the Evidence Act of which the law as to confessions formed a part.

After examining the provisions of the Code of 1898 and reading section 161, his Lordship observed that on the 14th May 1908 none of the conditions had been satisfied on which alone cognisance could be taken by Mr. Birley and following this train of reasoning therefore the confessions fall within the scope of section 161 of the Code after referring to the cases cited his Lordship said that his conclusion was that the enquiry had not disturbed by anything in the cited cases. In the view that is the Lordship took it was unnecessary to consider whether the enquiry had not actually commenced on the 14th of May the confessions would have been admissible.

Then were the confession vitiated by the fact that in some instances and to some extent the statements made were in response to questions. As far back as 1898 it was held by Sir Brauer Peacock that statements made by a prisoner in answer to questions were admissible against him. Therefore statements elicited from a prisoner in answer to questions were admissible against him. As regards these confessions Mr. Norton had pointed out that some copies had been convicted of an attempt to wreck the Lieutenant Governor's train and were now undergoing imprisonment, while according to those confessions, the copies, though they had confessed to the offence, were innocent.

Mr. Norton who had appeared for the Crown in the case as well as in this had submitted that their Lordships should move the Government to set aside these proceedings. That, however, was not within their Lordships' province. His Lordship, however, had no doubt that the matter would be the subject of a careful enquiry by the Government. In his Lordship's opinion Mr. Birley had complied with all the provisions prescribed by Section 161 of the Code and in addition to that Mr. Birley had been present at the trial and confirming him that the confessions were voluntary. His Lordship held that the confessions had been properly ly admitted in evidence by the Sessions Judge.

His Lordship next dealt with the evidence of what had been termed the watch or shadowing witnesses. The evidence of these witnesses was either general or specific. His Lordship then referred in detail to the evidence of these witnesses and remarked that there reports were not by any means simply notes. In his Lordship's opinion an error had been committed by the exclusion of those documents.

Although there might be some doubts for some disbelief still in its broad features the case for the prosecution was a genuine one and was not connected by the Police authorities. In this connection his Lordship wished to remark that Inspector Shamsul Alam discovered great commendation. As regards the searches, some of them were irregular. In the case of some of the searches there were not the two witnesses directed the Code while in the case of other searches, the witnesses did not conform to the statutory provisions imposed by the Code. With regard to the search at the garden, notwithstanding the evidence, his Lordship was doubtful as to whether the search list was completed at the garden. On the whole Lordship was not convinced that the search list was completed at the garden, but this was more a matter of fact than of substance. In the view his Lordship took this was only of importance in respect of exhibit 81 for in view of Anobhindo Ghose's acquittal the discovery of exhibit 1121 lost its importance.

There was an enormous mass of documents, a great number of which had been made exhibit in this case. In dealing with documentary evidence it was necessary to keep constantly in mind the use to which it could be legitimately put. Referring to the comparison of handwriting his Lordship said that the Sessions Judge had stated in his writing to be in the handwriting of one or other of the accused but whether this comparison took place with the help of the assessor or not was not known. No expert had been called in although there was a Government expert in handwriting. That the aid of a handwriting expert was of value was clearly the opinion of so distinguished a Judge as Justice Blackburn. After making such comparisons as he could as to the accused's handwriting his Lordship was unable to hold that the handwriting had been proved by the method adopted. A confession was not evidence against a co-accused in the sense that conviction on that alone could be supported. It would, however, lend authority to other evidence and the confessions in this case had been largely employed for that purpose.

Among the documents used as evidence in this case were a number of copies of the Yugantar newspaper, the contention of the prosecution being that that newspaper was a "link of the conspiracy." Turning to the articles of the Yugantar that had been put on his Lordship's list it was unnecessary that he should go into them. A large number of them had been read by Mr. Norton. His Lordship could not put his own views regarding these articles better than by adopting the languages which the Sessions Judge had used with regard to these articles which exhibited a burning hatred of the British race. His Lordship could not pass over consideration of the Yugantar articles without considering the skill and spirit with which they had been translated for the purpose of this case from the original into English. As far as his Lordship could judge the translations had been to the spirit of the original while at the same time the translations had been pressed in a forcible English.

Turning to the legal aspect of these charges his Lordship said that as in his view no offence had been committed under section 121, he thought it right to refrain from making any comments as to the charge under that section. So far as conspiracy was charged the case rested on sections 121 A a conspiracy consisted not merely in the intention of two or more to do an unlawful act. One of the assessors in coming to the conclusion that there was no conspiracy seemed to have been influenced by the idea that there was no immediate danger but that a far off revolution was contemplated. Barindra in his confession no doubt spoke of a far-off revolution but went on to say that they wished to be ready for it and that they were collecting weapons in small quantities. Major Black had stated that judging from all the articles found he would take them value to be Rs. 500 to Rs. 600. There was no reluctance to use explosives to take human life and for assassinations. The conspiracy was not childish. Thought justify the charge of conspiracy there must be agreement, there need not be proof of direct meeting nor conversation nor need the parties be brought into each other's presence. The agreement might be due to a common concerted plan to carry out the unlawful design. Nor was it necessary that all should join the scheme from the first. Those that came in at a latter stage were equally guilty. As regards the evidence it was of a general character. From the nature of the case a large portion of the evidence was circumstantial. There was also a danger in a case like the present that suspicion might take the place of legal proof. A Judge however could not set himself above the law or mould it to suit the exigencies of a particular case.

The question of punishment is one of considerable difficulty. Those who have been convicted are not ordinary criminals. They are for the most part men of education of strong religious instincts and in some cases of considerable force of character. At the same time they have been convicted of one of the most serious offences against the State in that they have conspired war against the king and the punishment must be in proportion to the offence.

For the purpose of punishment Barindra Kumar Ghose, Ullashkar Dutt, Upendra Nath Bannerjee and Hem Chandra Datta may properly be grouped together for they were the leaders of the society and Ullashkar Dutt and Hem Chandra Datta actually manufactured bombs that were used. We sentence each of them to transportation for life.

The next class include Bibhaty Bhawan Sircar, Bishi Kesh Kanjilal and Inda Bhawan Roy, whose prominence in the society is shown by the part they took in one or other of the attempted outrages disclosed by the evidence in the case. We sentence each of them to transportation for a term of ten years.

We sentence each of the following Sudhir Kumar Sircar, Puresh Chandra Maulik, Abhinash Chandra Bhatta, charged to transportation for a term of seven years.

We sentence Sishir Kumar Ghose and Nirapada Roy respectively to five years rigorous imprisonment.

Mr. Justice Conduff and I are divided in opinion as to the conviction of Sailerendra Nath Bose, Birendra Chandra Sen, Sushil Kumar Sen, Krishnasibhan Sanjal and Indra Nath Nandy, in the case. With our opinions thereon must be laid before another Judge of the Court, as provided in section 429 of the Criminal Procedure Code.

THE BERRAH DACTY.

The case of Sasi Sarkar, now on bail, who was alleged to be the ringleader of the Berrah dacty and who now stands charged under section 19 of the Arms Act, has again been adjourned under similar circumstances. The defence prayed for transferring the case to the Sessions for trial, but the Magistrate heard the arguments from the pleaders of both sides and fixed 15th November to pass orders as to whether charges should be framed; but yesterday the Magistrate went through the Police diary and some additional witnesses should be examined. Summons were consequently issued against them.

HILARADI SALTATION CASE.

Mr. Hume at the outset said: My submission, your worship, is that there is no necessity of sending the case to the Sessions.

Babu Manojkumar: We have alternative prayers to make either the case may be sent to the Sessions or your Honour do kindly try the case taking another Bengal knowing Magistrate as your colleague.

Court remarked that by taking another gentleman with him he would only be creating a precedent.

Mr. Bose: No, your honour that was done in a defamation case previously tried by Mr. Pearson. It will be better for the accused if the case is sent to the sessions as we doubt the correctness of the translations. I may mention to your Worship that in the Chittagong solution case which recently came before the High Court by way of appeal, the Chief Justice regretted that the case was not tried at the sessions as the correctness of the translations was doubted. The desire of the Chief Justice may be carried out in this case.

Court: I will only see whether considering the gravity of the offence I can adequately punish the accused. I will consider no other ground.

Then the Magistrate framed charges under section 121A, I. P. C. against the accused.

The charges were read out and explained to the accused who pleaded not guilty.

The case stands adjourned till the 23rd instant for cross-examination.

THE AHMEDABAD INCIDENT.

Surendranath Ganeshporsad Banerji, a Bengalee aged about twenty was arrested at Nana's chowk Garden, yesterday morning while Viceroy's procession was to pass along that road. He was found loitering about and was arrested on suspicion. He is suspected of being connected in the bomb outrage at Ahmedabad and will be taken there for being identified by Mr. Barrow who says he had seen a young Hindu throwing something at the Viceroy's carriage and would be able to identify him if placed before him. Mr. Barrow visited the injured Hindu in Ahmedabad hospital and at once said he was not the man who threw the missile at the Viceroy. The dying deposition of the injured man was recorded yesterday, particulars of which are not made public.

In poster Pettigara of the Criminal Investigation Department Bombay arrested one Nandlal Pranshunker alias Kanchan Kumar a resident of Ourethi in the Khayra District on suspicion of his being concerned in the attempted bomb outrage at Ahmedabad. Nandlal is a young Hindu of twenty-five and had once been convicted of rioting in Bombay during the Tilak trial last year. He was arrested at Cowasji Patel Tank Road last evening and was placed to-day before Res. Bahadur Settyad the Third Presidency Magistrate. Application was made to remand the accused in police custody. The accused opposed the application, stating that he had children and that his wife was ill. The Magistrate however granted the remand applied for. Kanchan Kumar will also be probably taken to Ahmedabad for identification by Mr. Barrow Commissioner Northern Division.

The Agra Police Torture case in which Sub-Inspector Gajndhar Prasad was charged with assault on men and women in his circle, wrongful confinement to extort money etc. has at last gone up for revision before the Sessions Judge of Agra and continues to excite the greatest interest in local circles. It would be remembered that the Joint Magistrate of Agra E. P. D. originally put to the charges held charge 11th November. Against this decision a Special Appeal was filed a prayer for revision and this has now been granted to public.

ANTI-HINDU WRITINGS IN THE "AFGHAN."

A meeting of the Hindus was held at Dera Ismail Khan to protest against the Anti-Hindu articles which appeared in the "Afghan." They have sent a memorial to the Local Government praying that action should be taken against the paper for setting class against class.

SUIT FOR DAMAGES.

The test suit for damages instituted by Babu Ananda Chandra Roy, President of the Dacca People's Association, against Khajeh Mahomed Yusuff Chairman of Dacca Municipality for having withdrawn permission already given to hold a boycott celebration in the Northbrook Hall, is one which is sure to excite considerable interest. The amount of damage is a paltry one—only Rs. 13, but it involves a great principle and as such the result will be anxiously awaited.

THE RAJNAGORE DACOITY.

In connection with the Rajnagore dacoity, the Kotwali Police, headed by Deputy Superintendent, Chakravarty, searched the house and the stationery shop of Dr. Provat Chandra Sen, proprietor of the Imperial Seminary, a local Entrance School, and after examining some books and documents, took away nearly Rs. 1,200 in ornament and cash.

The house of Rasik Babu, a jute merchant, was also searched and his son, Jogesh, an accused in the Janmasthanu stabbing case was arrested. The Police also took away a necklace of Jogesh's mother. The search continued for two hours from 1-30 A. M. Jogesh is in the lock-up. The money has been returned to Provat Babu.

The local C. I. D. have arrested two young men named Upendra Chakravarti and Hem Sen of Madhyadara Vikrampur in connection with the train dacoity near Sripur. They are now in the lock up and bail has been refused.

Shanti Chandra Mukherjee the boy who was arrested here some six months ago on a warrant issued by the Faridpur Magistrate in connection with Narin dacoity and subsequently refused bail has been discharged. The Magistrate will be moved to-day to grant him bail for Dacca Magistrate's charge.

There is yet no authentic details as to the daring post office robbery which was attempted at Malkangar Taltollah, near Dacca, three days ago. The postmaster and peon it seems were attacked with knives by the depredators, who killed them by cutting their throats. The post office safe, however, was left intact ostensibly, because the dacoits were unable to find the key as they hoped to do. There is no information as to whether the robbery was committed by bhadrak youths, as is thought in the two recent dacoities already reported. The police are actively engaged making inquiries.

BRAHMACHYA

The seed and soul of STUDENT-LIFE: The true builder of
the Nation.

BY

SJ. ROMESH CHANDRA CHAKRAVARTY.

English Edition, bound Re. 1.

THE THEOSOPHIST (conducted by Col.
H. S. OLCOTT, P. T. S.), Madras:—"An
excellent publication deserves to be in the hands of every Hindu student who neglects
his religion."

THE GUJARATI PUNCH (Ahmedabad):—

"In this book are collected the several rules laid down by the Rishis of old to be observed by every Brahmachari. No greater service is rendered to a country than the one which teaches the formation of individual character in the youth of the country. Efforts in the direction of bringing up the posterity in a way that would elevate their mental position which would ultimately work up the way to bring back
the country to its good old position are not
less needed than Congresses and Conferences.
The book should be in the hands of every student."

THE HINDU ORGAN, (Jaffna, Ceylon):—

"Bramacharyya describes the life which Bramachari ought to live. It contains the pith of the rules laid down by learned Rishis of the past for the promotion of the physical, intellectual and spiritual culture of students. The changes which the altered conditions of present-day-life require are carefully noted. The book is in its structure Hindu, but the rules given
in it are such as appeal to the common experience of all mankind."

From THE HON'BLE JUSTICE SIR S. SUB-
RAMANIAM IYER, K. C. I. E., Vice-Chancel-

FACTS AND OPINIONS.

The Lieutenant-Governor's Mercy.

The outcry of the Moderates against the exclusion of their best men has led to certain concessions by which apparently the Government hope to minimise or obviate the formidable opposition that is slowly gathering head against the new Councils. These concessions remove not a single objectionable principle from the Bill. They are evidently designed to facilitate the admission into the Council of the two men in Bengal whose opposition may prove most harmful to the chances of the exceedingly skilful Chinese puzzle called the Councils Regulations by, which the consummate tacticians of Simla hope to preserve full control for the authorities while earning the credit of a liberal and popular reform. The modification by which men who have served three years on a Municipality become eligible even if they are no longer on any such body at the time of election, seems specially designed to admit Sj. Bhupendranath Bose who, with all the other well-known men of Bengal, was excluded by the careful provisions of the Scheme. But to have placated Si. Bhupendranath and at the same time disqualified the greater Moderate leader would obviously have been an infructuous concession. Accordingly, we are now given to understand that the Lieutenant-Governor has been pleased to intimate to the most powerful man in Bengal that, if he stands for election, the disqualification under which he has been placed, will be waived as a special concession in his favour! We do not know what were the feelings of Sj. Surendra Nath when he was informed that this back-door had been opened to him by the indulgence of the bureaucracy to its dismissed servant. But to us the permission seems to be more humiliating and injurious than the original exclusion, - to Bengal, if not to Surendranath personally. As things stand, he cannot make use of the concession without forfeiting his already much-imperilled popularity and putting himself uselessly into a ridiculous and undignified position. If he stood now, the whole country would believe that his dissatisfaction with the Reforms was due to his personal exclusion and not to the vicious principles of the Scheme. He would enter not in his own right, but by the grace and mercy of the bureaucracy of whom he has been the life-long opponent. And to what end? To stand isolated or with a handful of ineffective votes against a solid phalanx of officials, Government nominees, Europeans, Mahomedans and lukewarm waverers or reactionaries. Sj. Surendranath gains nothing for himself or the country by entering the Councils on these shameful terms, he gains every thing by holding aloof and standing out for better conditions.

An Ominous Presage.

The Indian Daily News nowadays plays the Statesman's abandoned role of the Friend of India. This journal has been recently harping on the necessity of the reform of the Municipalities and throwing out suggestions of the lines on which these reforms should be framed. We cannot imagine anything more ominous, more fatal to the little of self-government that we possess, than these suggested reforms. We pointed out in our article on the Reforms that under this scheme the Municipalities were the only weak point in the Government's armour and we uttered a prophecy that the Government would follow the policy of thorough and mend this vulnerable part. This is precisely what our Anglo-Indian "friend" earnestly and repeatedly calls on them to do without farther delay. The principle to be enforced is that same false, vicious and antedemocratic principle of the representation of separate interests which has made the new Reforms a blow straight at the heart of progress instead of an important step in progressive development. It is true that the Daily News deprecates separate electorates and advocates official control veiled and occasional instead of official control insistent, naked and unashamed. But we know perfectly well that official control veiled and occasional, as in the universities, can be made as potent and effective a weapon for the suppression of independent action as official control direct and habitual. And if the European, the Mahomedan and the landlord are to predominate in the Municipalities as in the reformed councils and the representation of the "professional classes" carefully restricted, we do not care whether it is done by separate electorates or by some other equally careful manipulation of the electoral lists. The result will be the same. The Daily News seems to be inspired in its anxiety for reform by two lofty motives, the predominance of the European vote, wealthy but small in numbers, and the distinction of the predominance of the professional men who, under present circumstances, can alone represent educated India. On the Councils the non-official European representation is small, not in proportion to the numbers of its constituency, but in its comparative voting power, yet this class is on the whole satisfied, because it not only gets what it knows to be disproportionately large representation but can be sure of the co-operation of the official in furthering its interests. On the Municipalities, if the direct official control disappears, it will be necessary for the European vote to be dominant so as to prevent a combination of other elements from pushing other interests to the detriment of European privilege or monopoly. The distinction which this journal, in common with other Anglo-Indian papers, draws between men with a real stake in the country and educated men, who apparently because of their education have none, shed a flood of light on the kind of friendship which it cherishes for the people of this country.

Chowringhee Humour.

The Statesman as a friend was intolerable; as a humourist it is hardly less difficult to bear. There was an elephantine attempt at sardonic humour in a recent article in which it weightily urged the educated community to overlook defects and take full and generous advantage of the great opportunity from the benefits of which they have been excluded. That is the peculiar humour of these reforms.

They are a Barmecide's feast, gorgeous dishes and silver covers with only unsubstantial air inside, and even from that chameleon's feast the educated classes are carefully excluded, except in a pitifully infinitesimal degree. Yet the Anglo-Indian papers are indignantly remonstrating with the educated classes for not crowding to the table where there are no seats for them and feasting themselves fat on the dainty invisible meats which others are so eager to partake of. It may be asked why others are so anxious for these aerial privileges. Well, that is because it is only the educated classes who are really hungry for substantial political food, the others are eager to see and handle the gorgeous dishes and the silver covers, to say nothing of the kudos or of having dined at so rich a house and its material advantages to the individual. But the educated Hindus have had a surfeit of specious outsides and are learning to merge the interests of the individual in the good of the nation.

The Last Resort.

The resort to boycott is becoming instinctive in men's blood; not only in India but everywhere, men confronted by opposition of a nature which renders it impossible to deal with it effectively, take to boycott with an admirable spontaneity. The rapid spread of this ancient Indian device since China and India applied it for the first time on the gigantic Asiatic scale, is a sign of the times. We can naturally understand the feeling of discomfort which leads the Anglo-Indian papers to deprecate this move on the part of the Moderates. It is true that the reported agreement to boycott the Councils has been denied by representatives of Moderate opinion, but whether a formal resolution to the effect was recorded or not at the momentous meeting in the Indian Association's rooms, it is this policy which the Moderates are following for the excellent reason that there is no other. As they pathetically complain, it is not they who have boycotted the Government but the Government which has boycotted them. That is not, of course, literally true. S. J. Ambikacharan Majumdar who has refused to stand as a candidate, is eligible under the Government rules; the disabilities in the way of S. J. Bhupendranath and Surendranath have been waived or removed. But this the Government has taken care to ensure, that if they enter, and evidently the Government desires that they should enter, it shall be as grandiose nonentities, stripped of all powerful backing, individual voices and nothing more. Co-operation on such conditions would be the end of the Moderate party in Bengal and the absolute destruction of the Moderates is an event, which, we confess, we could not contemplate with equanimity. We need a party which will form a convenient channel through which the Government can glide gradually down the path of concession until events have educated our bureaucracy to the point of recognizing the necessity of negotiation with the Nationalists. We are therefore glad that the Government has made it imperative on the Moderates to answer boycott with boycott. We have expressed our admiration of the skill with which the Reform Regulations have been framed, but it is the skill of the keen-eyed but limited tactician, cleverly manipulating forces for a small immediate gain, not of the far-seeing political strategist. On the contrary, the framers have flung away supports which they ought to have secured and secured others which are either weak or unreliable. The nonentities who are scrambling for a seat in the Council cannot hold the fort for them; the support of the landholders is lacking in sincerity and they are, besides, a force the bureaucracy themselves have stripped ruthlessly of their ancient strength and leadership, which cannot now be recovered by a seat on the Councils: the Muslims have suddenly been raised by the amazingly shortsighted policy of Lord Morley into an eager, ambitious and pushing political force which will demand a higher and ever higher price for its support. On the other hand the Moderates have been humiliated in the sight of all India and made a general laughing stock, and the entire Hindu community, always the mightiest in potentiality in the land and now growing conscious of its might, has been put far on the way to becoming a permanent and embittered opposition. O wonders of Anglo-Indian statesmanship!

THE MEN THAT PASS.

Mr. Romesh Chandra Dutt is dead. After a long life of the most manifold and untiring energy, famous, honored, advanced in years, with a name known in England as well as India the man always successful, always favoured of Fortune, always striving to deserve her by skill and diligence, type of a race that passes, of a generation that to younger minds is fast losing the appearance of reality and possibility, has passed away at the height and summit of his career before his great capacities could justify themselves to the full in his new station, but also before the defects of his type could be thoroughly subjected to the severe ordeal of the times that have come upon us. The landmarks of the past fall one by one and none rise in their place. The few great survivors here and there become more and more dignified monuments of the last century and less and less creators of the living present. New ideals, new problems, new men, almost a new race wholly different in mind, character, temperament, feeling, rise swiftly and wait till they can open the gates of the future and occupy the field of action.

The official, the Congress politician, the wellread litterateur, the Oriental scholar, the journalist, proficient in English and fluent of Western ideas, the professional man successful and sleek, these were the foremost men of the old generation, those who were in the eyes of all sreshtha, the best, in whose footsteps, therefore, all strove to follow and on whose pattern all formed themselves. An active, self-confident, voiceful generation making up by these qualities for the lack of height, depth and breadth in their culture and atoning for the unoriginal imitativeness to which they were doomed, by the fidelity in detail and framework of the imitation! In all but one of these lines of activity Mr. Dutt had achieved a high distinction among the men of his own generation, and we doubt whether another man could be pointed out among them so many-sided, so full of strength and hope and energy, so confident, so uniformly successful. Nature was liberal to him of her gifts. Fortune of her favours. A splendid physique, robust and massive equipped him to bear the strain of an unceasing activity: a nature buoyant, sanguine, strong, as healthy as his frame, armed him against the shocks of life and commanded success by insisting upon it; an egoism natural to such a robust vitality seized on all things as its provender and enabled its possessor thoroughly to enjoy the good things of life, which it successfully demanded; a great tact and savoir faire steered him clear of unnecessary friction and avoidable difficulties; an unrivalled quickness of grasp, absorption and assimilation, more facile than subtle or deep, helped him to make his own all that he heard or read; a rapid though not ingenious brain showed him how to use his material with the best effect and most practical utility; and a facile pen and speech which never paused for a thought or a word, could always be trusted to clothe what he wished to convey in a form respectable and effective and so well put as to conceal the absence of native literary faculty and intellectual distinction. These were Nature's presents to him at his birth. Fortune placed him in a wealthy, wellread and wellknown family, gave him the best advantages of education the times could afford, sent him to England and opened the doors of the Civil Service, the pinnacle of the young Indian's aspiration in his days, and crowned him with the highest prizes that that highest of careers could yield to a man of his hue and blood. It is characteristic of his career that he should have died as Prime Minister of the Indian State which has been most successful in reproducing and improving upon the Anglo-Indian model of administration,

There were limits, as we have hinted, to the liberality of Nature. Of all the great Bengalis of his time Romesh Chandra Dutt was perhaps the least original. His administrative faculties were of the second order, not of the first; though he stood for a time foremost among the most active of Congress politicians and controversialists, he was neither a Ranade nor a Surendranath, had neither the gift of the organiser and political thinker nor the gift of the orator; he had literary talent of an imitative kind but no literary genius; he wrote well on scholastic subjects and translated pleasantly and effectively, but was no great Sanskrit scholar; he cannot rank with Ranade or even with Mr. Gokhale as an economist, and yet his are the most politically effective contributions to economical literature that recent years have produced. It must be admitted that his activity and dexterity of work were far in excess of his literary ability or scholastic conscientiousness. It is doubtful, therefore, whether any of his voluminous work in many kinds will be much longer remembered, with the possible exception of his Bengali historical novels in which he touched highwater mark. His translation of the Rigveda by its ease and crispness blinds the uninitiated reader to the fact that it may be a very pretty translation but it is not the Veda. His history of ancient Indian civilisation is a masterly compilation, void of original research, which is rapidly growing antiquated. In fact, the one art Mr Dutt had in the highest degree and in which alone it can be said that he did not only well but best, was, the art of the journalist, and the pamphleteer. Originality and deep thought; are not required of a journalist, nor delicacy, nor subtlety, nor deep thought his success would be limited rather than assisted by such qualities. To seize victoriously on the available materials, catch in them what will be interesting and effective and put it brightly and clearly, this is the dharma of the journalist, and, if we add the power of making the most of a case and enforcing a given view with irresistible energy, dexterity and apparent unanswerableness, we shall have added all that is necessary to turn the journalist into the pamphleteer. No man of our time has had these gifts to the same extent as Mr. Dutt. The best things he ever did were, in our view, his letters to Lord Curzon and his Economic History. The former fixed public opinion in India irretrievably and nobody cared even to consider Lord Curzon's answer. "That settles it" was the general feeling every ordinary reader contracted for good after reading Romesh Dutt's brilliant and telling indictments.

Without the Economic History and its damning story of England's commercial and fiscal dealings with India we doubt whether the public mind would have been ready for the Boycott. In this one instance it may be said of him that he not only wrote history but created it. But all his works, with the exception of the historical novels, were rather pieces of successful journalism and electioneering than literature. Still, even where it was most defective, his work was always useful to the world. For instance, his Ramayan and Mahabharata, though they are execrable poetry and do unpardonable violence to the spirit of the original, yet familiarised the average reader in England with the stories of the epics and thus made the way easy for future interpreters of the East to the West. In brief, this may be said in unstinted praise of Romesh Chandra Dutt, that he was a gigantic worker and did an immense amount of pioneer spadework by which the future will benefit.

We have dwelt on this interesting and vigorous personality as one of the most typical of the men that pass, much more typical than greater or more original contemporaries. The work they did is over and the qualities with which they were equipped for that work will no longer sufficiently serve our purpose. An education at once more subtle and more massive, a great originality, force and range of intellectual activity, an insatiable thirst for knowledge, the glut of a giant for work and action, mighty qualities of soul, a superhuman courage, self-abnegation and power to embrace and practise almost impossible ideals, these are the virtues and gifts India demands from the greatest among her sons in the future so that they may be sufficient to her work and her destinies. But such gifts as Romesh Dutta possessed are not to be despised. Especially did his untiring capacity for work and his joyous vitality and indestructible buoyancy make him a towering reproach to the indolent, listless, sneering and anaemic generation that intervened between him and the recent renaissance.

THE NATIONAL VALUE OF ART.

III

The work of purifying conduct through outward form and habitual and seemly regulation of expression, manner and action is the lowest of the many services which the artistic sense has done to humanity, and yet how wide is the field it covers and how important and indispensable have its workings been to the progress of civilisation! A still more important and indispensable activity of the sense of beauty is the powerful help it has given to the formation of morality. We do not ordinarily recognise how largely our sense of virtue is a sense of the beautiful in conduct and our sense of sin a sense of ugliness and deformity in conduct. It may easily be recognised in the lower and more physical workings, as for instance in the shuddering recoil from cruelty, blood, torture as things intolerably hideous to sight and imagination or in the aesthetic disgust at sensual excesses and the strong sense, awakened by this disgust, of the charm of purity and the beauty of virginity. This latter feeling was extremely active in the imagination of the Greeks and other nations not noted for a high standard in conduct, and it was purely aesthetic in its roots. Pity again is largely a vital instinct in the ordinary man associated with jugupsa, the loathing for the hideousness of its opposite, ghrina, disgust at the sordidness and brutality of cruelty, hardness and selfishness as well as at the ugliness of their actions so, that a common word for cruel in the Sanscrit language is nirghrina, the man without disgust or loathing, and the word ghrina approximates in use to kripa, the lower or vital kind of pity. But even on a higher plane the sense of virtue is very largely aesthetic and, even when it emerges from the aesthetic stage, must always call the sense of the beautiful to its support if it is to be safe from the revolt against it of one of the most deep-seated of human instincts. We can see the largeness of this element if we study the ideas of the Greeks, who never got beyond the aesthetic stage of morality. There were four gradations in Greek ethical thought,

—the euprepes, that which is seemly or outwardly decorous: the dikaion, that which is in accordance with dike or nomos, the law, custom and standard of humanity based on the sense of fitness and on the codified or uncoded mass of precedents in which that sense has been expressed in general conduct,—in other words the just or lawful; thirdly, the agathon, the good, based partly on the seemly and partly on the just and lawful, and reaching towards the purely beautiful; then, final and supreme, the kalon, that which is purely beautiful, the supreme standard. The most remarkable part of Aristotle's moral system is that in which he classifies the parts of conduct not according to our idea of virtue and sin, papa and punya, but by a purely aesthetic standard, the excess, defect and golden, in other words correct and beautiful, mean of qualities. The Greek view of life was imperfect even from the standpoint of beauty, not only because the idea of beauty was not sufficiently catholic and too much attached to a fastidious purity of form and outline and restraint, but because they were deficient in love. God as beauty, Srikrishna in Brindavan, Shyamamundara, is not only Beauty. He is also Love, and without perfect love there cannot be perfect beauty, and without perfect beauty there cannot be perfect delight. The aesthetic motive in conducts limit and must be exceeded in order that humanity may rise. Therefore it was that the Greek mould had to be broken and humanity even revolted for a time against beauty. The agathon, the good, had to be released for a time from the bondage of the kalon, the aesthetic sense of beauty, just as it is now struggling to deliver itself from the bondage of the euprepes and the dikaion, mere decorousness, mere custom, mere social law and rule. The excess of this anti-aesthetic tendency is visible in Puritanism and the baser forms of asceticism. The progress of ethics in Europe has been largely a struggle between the Greek sense of aesthetic beauty and the Christian sense of a higher good marred on the one side by formalism, on the other by an unlovely asceticism. The association of the latter with virtue has largely driven the sense of beauty to the side of vice. The good must not be subordinated to the aesthetic sense, but it must be beautiful and delightful, or to that extent it ceases to be good. The object of existence is not the practise of virtue for its own sake but ananda, delight, and progress consists not in rejecting beauty and delight, but in rising from the lower to the higher, the less complete to the more complete beauty and delight.

The third activity of aesthetic faculty, higher than the two already described, the highest activity of the artistic sense before it rises to the plane of the intellect, is the direct purifying of the emotions. This is the katharsis of which Aristotle spoke. The sense of pleasure and delight in the emotional aspects of life and action, this is the poetry of life, just as the regulating and beautiful arrangement of character and action is the art of life. We have seen how the latter purifies, but the purifying force of the former is still more potent for good. Our life is largely made up of the eight rasas. The movements of the heart in its enjoyment of action, its own and that of others, may either be directed downwards, as is the case with the animals and animal men, to the mere satisfaction of the ten sense organs and the vital desires which make instruments of the senses in the average sensual man, or they may work for the satisfaction of the heart itself in a predominately emotional enjoyment of life, or they may be directed upwards through the medium of the intellect rational and intuitional to attainment of delight through the seizing on the source of all delight, the Spirit, the satyam, sundaram, anandam who is beyond and around, the source and the basis of all this worldwide activity, evolution and progress. When the heart works for itself, then it enjoys the poetry of life, the delight of emotions, the wonder, pathos, beauty, enjoyableness, loveableness, calm, serenity, clarity and also the grandeur, heroism, passion, fury, terror and horror of life, of man, of Nature, of the phenomenal manifestation of God. This is not the highest, but it is higher than the animal, vital and externally aesthetic developments. The large part it plays in life is obvious, but in life it is hampered by the demands of the body and the vital passions. Here comes in the first mighty utility, the triumphant activity of the most energetic forms of art and poetry. They provide a field in which these pressing claims of the animal can be excluded and the emotions, working disinterestedly for the satisfaction of the heart and the imagination alone, can do the work of katharsis, emotional purification, of which Aristotle spoke. Chittasuddhi, the purification of the heart, is the appointed road by which man arrives at his higher fulfilment, and, if it can be shown that poetry and art are powerful agents towards that end, their supreme importance is established. They are that, and more than that. It is only one of the great uses of these things which men nowadays are inclined to regard as mere ornaments of life and therefore of secondary importance.

COMMENT AND CRITICISM.

Prof. Jitendra Lal Bannerji on Western Civilisation.

—oO—

In his interesting and readable article on "Aravinda Ghosh—a study," Prof. Jitendra Lal Bannerji makes remarks which, I am sure, will be deplored by every right-thinking man in the country. I, of course, do not find fault with him for eulogising Mr. Aravinda Ghosh in the manner he does. Every man has the right to worship his hero. To speak the truth I sincerely respect Prof. Bannerji for being so good a hero-worshipper. He evidently does not belong to the class of men who find none to admire in this wide world. What I greatly deplore is the language he uses in characterising Western civilisation. "Western civilisation" we are informed "had lost its gloss and glamour for him. He had penetrated behind its glittering outer shell of painted brilliance and had sounded to the depth all its baldness, coarseness, barrenness and the barbarism of its inner significance." Now it is unnecessary to say anything in praise of Western civilisation. It is not on its trial and requires no defence. Even the greatest detractors of it pay homage to it in the daily acts of their life. Suffice it to say that if it had been anything like what Prof. Bannerji paints it to be, it would not have dominated the world and been in the ascendant. No sham ever endures in God's world. To call a civilisation which has produced Shakespeare and Milton, Wordsworth and Coleridge, Shelly and Byron, Goethe and Schiller, Tennyson and Browning, Descartes and Spinoza, Kant and Hegel, Newton and Leibnitz, Darwin and Spencer, Carlyle and Emerson, and the list might be indefinitely prolonged, "bald, coarse, barren and barbarous" in its inner significance, is—well, what shall I say? Language of this sort is the stock in trade of the baser kind of journals in this country, but is quite unworthy of a man of culture like Prof. Bannerji. I particularly object to Prof. Bannerji's language because of the infinite mischief which the sentiment it expresses is doing in this country. It is the seamy side of the nationalist movement in Bengal and is sure, if unchecked, ultimately to destroy whatever good has come out of it. A man who respects himself respects others. Respect for others is the correlative of self-respect. "Be a person and respect others as persons," is, according to a great philosopher, a fundamental principle of practical life. What is true of individual life is also true of national life. A self-respecting nation respects other nations and a nation that does not respect other nations, does not in reality respect itself, in spite of appearances to the contrary. It is especially necessary for us, at the present stage of our progress, not to allow the faculty of admiration to grow weak. It is undeniable that we have still much to learn from the West. Such a belief may be unfashionable and unpopular at the present day, but, nevertheless, it is absolutely true. If we are unable to appreciate all that is great and good in the civilisation of the West, the losers shall be we and not the West. The onward march of Western civilisation will not be arrested by our failure to appreciate it, but the cause of progress in this country will suffer an irreparable loss.

Let us not hate others and overestimate ourselves. The feelings of overestimation and contempt, Spinoza truly says, are always evil. No lasting good ever comes out of hatred. It is love alone that avails in the long run, whatever the appearances may be. It is greatly to be regretted that gifted men like Prof. Bannerji, instead of combating the rampant mischief of the prevalent race-hatred, should however unwittingly, foment it. If the race feeling displayed by Anglo-Indians is bad, the race feeling displayed by Indians cannot be good. Let us have faith, surrounded though we are by circumstances that sorely try it, in the all-conquering power of love and remember that higher than nationalities, embracing them all and as the Organic Unity of them, though, as yet, only ideally, is Humanity.

BERRAMPUR. HIRALAL HALDAR.
November, 5 1909.

'Western Civilization.'

While thanking Prof. Haldar for the courteous tone of his comments I cannot say that this criticism has been very helpful or illuminating to me. Apparently he objects to the disparaging nature of my remarks on Western Civilization; and from that I may infer that he has a preference, or at any rate a high regard for this civilization. But he does not stop to make clear the grounds of this regard or this preference or what over it may be alleged. He contented himself with vague generalities? and— I hope he will pardon me for saying it—he seems to be labouring under a certain confusion and haziness of thought.

Thus he says: "Western Civilization had been any thing like what Prof. Panerice paints it to be it would not have dominated the world and been in the ascendant." Are we then to understand that material prosperity and dominance in the world are the best tests of civilization? We know indeed that this is a common fallacy but we had every reason to hope that Prof. Haldar would rise above this narrow and gross conception of civilization, as Ruskin is never tired of telling us, is primarily a thing of the heart; it makes men civil, humane, kindly, and generous. No doubt it issues in a system of outer conduct and life; but to take it as synonymous with material prosperity—to take it as comprised in mills and factories, in the railway and the steamship, or in the endless outer appertenances of modern life, is utterly to miss its meaning and significance.

Again Prof. Haldar says: "a nation that does not respect other nations, does not, in reality, respect itself." The sentiment sounds very beautiful and reads like a copy-book maxim. But it is such an obvious truism! and when trotted out with all the parade of a general truth, it seems so hollow and unmeaning. Let us take a concrete instance. The English are a self-respecting nation—so Prof. Haldar would readily admit. But do they just overflow with respect for other nations? Not even the boldest champion of Anglican civilization will have the hardihood to go so far as that.

Elsewhere Mr. Haldar says: "No sham ever endures in God's world." Again we feel tempted to exclaim—how like a copy-book maxim it reads! What an obvious truism it is! and what a profound fallacy it conceals! Even Carlyle, from whom Prof. Haldar borrows his remark, would say—no sham can ultimately endure in the world; but what prevents it from flourishing like a green bay-tree for large lengths of days and years? Is not the world encrusted thick with shams of very venerable antiquity—fossil remains of age-worn customs and obsolescent beliefs! and how can the besom of reform be better employed than in sweeping them away and purging the world from their corroding contagion. Because a certain type of civilization has existed for a certain length of time—are we to conclude that it must be excellent, because, forsooth, 'no sham can endure in God's world'? Obviously on the logic of Mr. Haldar, whatever is good; for if it were bad, it would cease to be.

But all this is nothing to the purpose. Prof. Haldar, as I have said already, does not stop to make clear the grounds of his preference for Western civilization. We must, therefore, rest satisfied with such hints of preference as he has given us; and we find these hints in one sentence: "To call a civilization which has produced Shakespeare and Milton, Wordsworth and Coleridge, Shelley and Byron..... Kant and Hegel, Darwin and Spencer, Carlyle and Emerson, and the list might be indefinitely prolonged, 'bald, coarse, barren, barbarous' is, well what shall I say?" As a matter of fact, he ends by saying: evidently my irreverence has scandalized him too much. But, while penitent for the shock I have given him, I may say that Prof. Haldar's mode of procedure is rather curious. He calls together the names of the best sons of Europe and America, claims them as the products of Western civilization, and then triumphantly asks—a civilization which produces Shakespeare and Milton, &c., how can it be called bald, barren, barbarous, etc? It is difficult to expose the accumulated fallacies underlying such a proposition as this. I must answer by saying that I deny the validity of Mr. Haldar's standard criticism, and I deny the soundness of his mode of applying that standard. In other words, I deny that the worth of a civilization is to be judged by the very best products of that civilization and what is more important I deny that Shakespeare, Milton, Kant and Spinoza are the fruits of Western civilization in the generally accepted sense of that word.

The first of these points may be briefly dismissed. How is the civilization of a country to be judged? Is it to be judged by the greatest men of that country—rare and gifted souls, men who are more for the universe than for any particular country and race, men who by the very splendour of their genius are not to be taken as typical of their country and race but are to be regarded as beings afar and apart?—or is it to be judged by the life and character of the generality of men living in that country? Evidently the latter would be the more preferable standard. To refer again to the remark of Ruskin quoted above—civilization is that which makes men civil, which chastens and subdues their hearts. Its potency therefore is to be judged by the width no less than by the depth of its influence. Whether Western civilization is good or bad therefore, will depend upon the answer to this further question—what is its effect upon the generality of men living according to its canons? Has it made them gentle and humane? Has it refined their hearts and liberalized their minds? Has it made them restful and contented—at peace with themselves and in amity with the rest of the world? Has it helped them to harmonize themselves with the great march of phenomena in this moving cosmos of ours? Rightly or wrongly, I am of opinion that Western civilization has been judged by these standards and has been found wanting. I think that Western civilization, by drawing our attention too much to the things of the earth, blinds us to the spirit and takes off the finer and keener nebbage of our souls. I think further that Western civilization, with its exaggerated emphasis on the needs and pleasures of the individual, tends to make men hard, cold, and selfish; and, though it may make for material prosperity in the first instance, it is bound ultimately to end in red ruin and utter dissolution. No civilization which has made its basis on material comfort and material prosperity has ever been able to withstand the test of time. Egypt, Babylon, and Rome—what moral do they point? And the story of their fall—with what lesson is it fraught? Who knows, who can prophecy, that the civilization which has Paris, London, and New York for its holy places of pilgrimage is not destined to a ruin as utter ir retrievable as that?

But let us proceed to our second contention. Prof. Haldar claims that Shakespeare, Milton, Kant, Hegel, Spinoza, Emerson, —all are the fruits of Western civilization. I do not understand on what principle he has lumped all these names together. What has Shakespeare in common with Milton or Wordsworth with Byron and Shelley or Goethe with Tennyson and Browning (or either of these with Kant and Hegel)? And what curious chance must it be which brings together Darwin and Carlyle or Spencer and Emerson? These were all born in Europe and America; but is that sufficient to claim them as the products of Western civilization? Do you find in Europe and America, of the present day that universal human sympathy, that wide-eyed search for truth and beauty, that joy and delight in the bounty of heaven, which breathes through the plays of Shakespeare or that austere and unbending purity and nobility of thought which lends added majesty to the grand organ-music of Milton? Where again in the Western world of the 20th century, do we find any trace of that 'God-intoxication', which filled to overflowing the pious soul of Spinoza? Or that lofty and passionate conception of morality which thunders through the categorical imperative of Kant? Goethe, Carlyle, Emerson, Kant, Spinoza are in no sense either the products, offspring, fathers or teachers of the money-loving money-hungry civilization of the West. To me rather they seem like steep and noble promontories which jut out from the level current of European life, while round them, at their base, boils, rolls, and eddies the turbid swell of modern civilization with its mad thirst for money and comfort its savage lust of power and dominion.

But this brings me to the one fundamental misconception which seems to underlie the whole tenour of Mr. Haldar's criticism. What is that we mean by Western civilization? Obviously we mean this by term the type of civilization which actually prevails in the West at the present time—a civilization which in theory rests upon the basis that the individual is the centre of the world and that the body is the God of the individual, and which in practice issues in social strife, in aggressive warfare, and in fierce commercial competition. It would lead to endless confusion if we were to identify Western civilization with Christianity with Hellenism, with Calvinism with the culture of the Renaissance or with any of the various types of thought and sentiment which have prevailed and spread their sway in Europe from time to time. And yet this is precisely what Prof. Haldar has done. I may tell him, therefore, that I do not quarrel with that bright, vivid, luscious Hellenism which had Goethe for its fruit or that rigid austere Semitic culture which gave Spinoza to the world. I do not quarrel with that deep-toned Hindu spiritualism, which, in the mysterious ways of Providence claimed Emerson for its own in the far-off savannahs of unquiet, busy America; nor do I quarrel with that joyous humanity of culture which born with the Renaissance had its crown and consummation in the bland and universal genius of Shakespeare. No, the civilization which I have sought to criticize is that hungry, money-loving, material civilization which dominates Western life at the present day, and of which we may say that Mammon is its God; mills, factories and coal-mines are its temples and stately pantheons of worship; while the blare of the steam-whistle and the roar of the dynamite are its timbrels and harps of gold it has been well said by Prof. Haldar that we must respect others if we respect ourselves. But see that the thing you respect is worthy of respect and see, above all that the divinity you worship does not turn out to be some grinning and ghastly skeleton, some painted and whitened sepulchre—some phantom-image like that of Nabuchadnezzar with front of brass and feet of clay."

GULAB RANO CASE.

When the Musamat Gulab Rano case came up at the Lahore Chief Court to-day before Justices Robertson and Rattigan, Mr. Bevan Pottinger made a statement in which he outlined the Local Government's position.

Mr. Justice Robertson then read a lengthy order, in which he said that he and Mr. Justice Rattigan desire to express their sense of the courtesy to His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor for authorising the Government Advocate to make that statement. They fully recognised the position of Local Government in the matter, and they had not the slightest desire to enter into a controversy on the subject. He pointed out that he and his brother Judge approached this case in not the slightest spirit of controversy. The last thing they wanted to do was to trench on the privileges of the Executive in any way whatever. There was no controversial spirit in the action the Court was taking in the matter. It was simply because they had been looking very carefully into this case, and they considered that in the interests of the public it was desirable that they should look into it a little further. They were not going to discuss the correctness or incorrectness of the statements of the Resolution. What they proposed to do was to state clearly why they thought it necessary to go into the case and what they wanted to do. They were very jealous of their own privileges, but the last thing they wanted to do was to trench on the privileges of other people.

They also added the following rider to their judgment: No enquiry such as was suggested by us as desirable in our judgment of the 2nd December and with regard to the conduct of the police in regard to this case has been made by the executive authorities; but His Honour the Lieutenant-Governor has called for a memorandum from the Superintendent of Police concerned, and has considered that and the forwarding note of the D. I. G., the medical opinions by Colonel Cunningham and the papers submitted to him, and after him, and after considering these papers and those of the incomplete enquiry made before the trial has come to the conclusion that "The injuries from which Musamat Gulab Rano was suffering on June 5th were not caused by the police, and also that the omission to call the head constable, Abdulla, as a witness, was not one with any intention to suppress evidence." To this much we think the police are entitled. Recognising to the full the great difficulties under which the police labour, the good work which they do in the protection of life and property and the peculiar liability to false accusations of this kind, we could gladly have added our own conviction to the Lieutenant-Governor that no suspicion remained if we could have done so; but after all the persons concerned were not our subordinates and were not produced before us, and we fully recognise that it was for their own superiors to choose their own methods and for them to satisfy themselves and not us, as to the culpability of the subordinates. It was however necessary for us to make our own position clear, and we thought in justice to the police that they were entitled to have it on record here that their own responsible superiors considered them free from blame.

MR. K. G. GUPTA'S VIEWS ON COUNCIL REFORMS.

Mr. K. G. Gupta who is staying in Government House as a guest of His Excellency the Governor of Bombay interviewed by a press representative the Indian as to his views on the Reforms he gave the impression of not being enthusiastic about the subject. He did not definitely express himself dissatisfied with the provisions of the scheme, but one came away with the idea that they did not meet with his approval entirely. He said it should be given a fair trial and added "we should make the best of the scheme. It has defects. Some difficulties have arisen from supposed conflict of interests between different communities. If there had been no dissensions and the idea had not got abroad that there was a conflict of different interests in the scheme as originally proposed much of the difficulty would have been obviated. The original scheme of territorial basis of elections was a simple one. Granting of all demands of Mahomedans has given rise to reasonable complaints on the part of other communities."

BRAHMACHRYA

The seed and soul of STUDENT-LIFE: The true builder of the Nation.

BY

SJ. ROMESH CHANDRA CHAKRAVARTY.

English Edition, bound Re. 1.

THE THEOSOPHIST (conducted by Col. H. S. OLCOTT, P. T. S.), Madras: "An excellent publication deserves to be in the hands of every Hindu student who neglects his religion."

THE GUJARATI PUNCH (Ahmedabad):—
"In this book are collected the several rules laid down by the Rishis of old to be observed by every Brahmachari. No greater service is rendered to a country than the one which teaches the formation of individual character in the youth of the country. Efforts in the direction of bringing up the posterity in a way that would elevate their mental position which would ultimately work up the way to bring back the country to its good old position are not less needed than Congresses and Conferences. The book should be in the hands of every student."

THE HINDU ORGAN, (Jaffna, Ceylon):—
"Brahmacharya describes the life which Brahmachari ought to live. It contains the pith of the rules laid down by learned Rishis of the past for the promotion of the physical, intellectual and spiritual culture students. The changes which the altered conditions of present-day-life require are carefully noted. The book is in its structure Hindu, but the rules given in it are such as appeal to the common experience of all mankind."

From THE HON'BLE JUSTICE SIR S. SUBRAMANIAM IYER, K. C. I. E., Vice-Chancellor, Madras University. "I have no doubt it would be of the greatest use to those who are anxious to obtain a rational understanding of our institutions in their purity. I shall place the book very soon in the hands of the younger members of my family."

FACTS AND OPINION

and Congress.

[illegible]

Nationalism has never in the surrender on the table surrendered. At the flight, when the four Nations of the Confederacy were one of them in any way expressed by the delegates that there should be chosen who would represent the remainder. At the meeting in Hualien on February 20, 1947, All China Conference, however, that the majority Moderates must not have anything to do with the negotiations. Chiang Kai-shek brought out his following did not consider the majority, but by the moderates because they were a party, not the Moderates. . . . It was an attempt at reconciliation and nothing more and the majority went through his hand. . . . He Beauregard says that since the Nationalist sign the agreement with the Communist, the moderate moderates should be admitted to the Council who are not connected with the government with in the Empire and constitutional means of creation. They seem to me to be an indirect attempt at manipulating by him that, if we do not put the Moderates on the negotiating side, the doctrine must involve a secret pact and agreement. This is a method of playing a double game, which we think the Chinese Moderates have lost their former friend in Chiang Kai-shek and they will not work in Beijing. Only a negotiated means of meeting agreement on the Reform, that is the only way to improve relations and do not to put them in a position of being a puppet of the government.

do not know that any party is doing public political action in the favour of any but perfect equality. Nor is it a question of withdrawal or secession from the Union for any purpose. That is an utter impossibility which is too fundamental a question of practical public conduct to be a matter of difference. The dispute is over an ideal, whether we believe in it or not, as a province of the fundamental constitution on an equal basis of the carrying on of our affairs. A social development and reconstruction question. Whether our country is to have and equality can be effected by the breaking the Union or not is not a question which can be decided by the final compromise agreement between the South and the North interests. We must not forget to stress on the ideal which is the matter of principle and not on the compromise which is a matter of expediency and detail. As far as the United Congress is concerned, the National Government will not accept the compromise until it has accepted the principle of equal government type and the right of the Congress and the people to adopt to disband the government until they have been unanimously agreed to change the constitution to permit to do this or not, and which you think the conscience will be satisfied. The compromise to be made is not on that point, and it is not a question of a compromise which is a question of the principles on the point of the Pherozshah Mehta before they will admit fellowship with us then further negotiations are useless. Disunion must take its course.

The Spirit of the Negotiations.

Both the Bengalee and the Amrita Bazar Patrika seem to us to misunderstand the spirit of the negotiations which are proceeding. The Patrika harps on the inconsistency of the Moderate leaders negotiating on one side and at the same time holding a meeting to send delegates to the Three Men's Congress at Lahore. There is no such condition underlying the negotiations. At Hughly S. J. Surendranath expressly reserved his liberty to attend Sir Pherozshah's Congress and there is no reason why he should not do so if he thinks that his duty or his best policy. Nor do the Nationalists ask the Bengal Moderates to refrain, though they will naturally put their own interpretation on an alliance based on the pusillanimous surrender of the Boycott Resolution. On the other hand the Bengalee is quite mistaken in thinking that what the Nationalists seek is admission to the Convention or that they feel themselves under any necessity to go cap in hand to Sir Pherozshah Mehta and Mr. Gokhale. On the contrary they distinctly state that the Convention is not the Congress, but they recognise that as a mere matter of convenience the reparation of its errors by the Convention is the readiest method of bringing about a compromise and they are therefore willing to take the status quo as a basis for negotiations. They recognise no obligation to conform submissively to that basis or approach the Bombay leaders as the arbiters of their destiny.

A Salutary Rejection.

We would draw the attention of all weak-kneed Nationalists to the ban placed by the Bombay Government on the candidature of the distinguished and able Puna Nationalist, Mr. N. C. Kelkar. Mahratta Nationalism has never been so robustly uncompromising as the Bengal school in its refusal of co-operation in the absence of control, and Mr. Kelkar, though a sincere and ardent Nationalist, a friend and constant fellow-worker of Mr. Tilak, has always preserved an independent line in this matter and considered himself at liberty to help the cause of the country on bodies controlled by the Government. It greatly helps our cause that the Government should so emphatically set its face against any mistaken diplomacy of this kind. Mr. Kelkar's only specific offence against eligibility was a sentence of fine and two months' imprisonment for contempt of court, and that is short of the time required for ineligibility. S. J. Surendranath who, was, by the way sentenced to six months for a still graver contempt, has been specially exempted, unasked, by the Lieutenant Governor of Bengal from another disability. It is obvious therefore that Mr. Kelkar's real offence was his Nationalist views and his friendship with Mr. Tilak. We hope that all compromising Nationalists will take the lesson of this rebuff to heart. The object of the Government is to rally the Mahomedans and the Moderates and isolate the Nationalists. No doubt they mean by the Moderates the Loyalist section of that party, but they are evidently wishful not to entirely alienate the Nationalist Moderates, if they can do so while excluding them from all real weight on the Councils. But by what reasoning any Nationalist can imagine that he will escape the operation of the excluding clauses, we are at a loss to understand. We may also ask our Mahratta brothers what advantage they have gained by being less rigid than ourselves. They are, if anything, more rigorously persecuted than we are in Bengal. Weakness of any kind does not pay in dealing with the Briton.

The English Revolution.

The note of revolution which was struck with resounding force by Mr. Lloyd George and Mr. Winston Churchill in the quarrel with the Lords, is now ringing louder in England and has been taken up in soberer but not less emphatic tones by Mr. Asquith and Sir Edward Grey. There can be no doubt that there was dissension in the Cabinet over the Budget and that the concessions made by the Government in the process of passing it were forced upon Mr. Lloyd George and certainly not to the taste of that fiery and uncompromising Celt. But the reactionary attempt of the House of Lords to control finance, has evidently closed up the ranks by driving the Moderates over to the side of the revolution. It is evidently felt by the Liberals that, with an Upper Chamber more and more shamelessly and constantly a mere tool of the Conservative leaders, it is impossible for any Liberal Government to accept office unless it has a mandate to end or mend the Lords. We cannot believe that a similar feeling will not actuate the great mass of Liberals all over Great Britain and heal all differences. Already the Labour Executive has decided to make the victory easier for the Government by not dividing the forward vote in a considerable number of constituencies and we have no doubt this is the outward sign of a secret compact between the Labour Party and the Liberals by which the return of a powerful Socialist party has been secured. Even the extreme Socialists who usually are against all dealing with the middle class and whose motto is "A plague on both your houses," are calling on the Socialists of all shades to support the Government in abolishing the House of Lords. If Mr. Asquith had followed the line we suggested as possible in a previous number and introduced a moderate but effective bill for nullifying the Lord's veto, he would certainly have gained a number of Moderate votes which will now be denied to him, but it is doubtful whether the gain of the entire Socialist vote, secured by keeping himself free to end the House of Lords, is not, in the present condition of English politics, a compensation far exceeding the loss. Already Tariff Reform is receding into the background and promises to be a subordinate issue. The battle is over the constitutional, not the fiscal issue. By their anxiety to bring Unionist Labour candidates into the field and the eager talk of Conservative leaders about the necessity of reforming the Lords, the party of reaction show that they perfectly understand from what quarters disaster threatens. Now that the Liberal party is pledged to destroy the Lords, veto, the English Revolution is assured and it will be not a middle class but a Socialist and Labour revolution. This result is assured whether the Liberals win or lose in the present battle. One campaign does not decide the fortunes of such a war.

Aristocratic Quibbling

When we speculated that the Lords would be more likely to amend the Budget and leave to their opponents the onus of throwing the finances of the whole country into confusion, we underestimated the want of wit of which this highly venerable but somewhat brainless house is capable. This want of wit has shown itself in an unseasonable and wholly futile excess of refined cunning. The House of Lords felt that its great weakness when its conduct went before the country for its verdict, would be the odium of its unconstitutional attempt to interfere with the control of the finances by the people. To mend the unconstitutional appearance of their act, they have taken up this position, that they have no right to amend but they have the right to reject the Budget. It appears to be a right which they have sometimes been unwise enough to claim, but never unwise enough to enforce. The aristocratic hairsplitter who discovered this quibble, seems to have forgotten that, however pleasing the distinction may be to his ingenuity, the mass of the voters will not care one straw to examine fine distinctions which claim the whole and disclaim the part. They will simply say that the right of rejection means the right of baffling the representatives of the people and paralyzing finance. The other device of the Lords is to avoid the appearance of disputing the people's right by putting the rejection in the form of a referendum to the people, a procedure which the British constitution does not include in itself and which is entirely new. Unfortunately they have made too much noise about the woes of the Dukes and Mr. Balfour has made the damaging admission that it is only the liquor and the land clauses to which he objects, so that it is too late to pretend that it is anxiety for the liberties of the people and not solicitude for their own pockets and the pockets of their allies the publicans that has dictated their action. The indecent crowding of Lords who never before attended a single sitting, to reject the Budget was, also a tactical error. On the whole the action of the House of Lords has greatly helped Mr. Asquith and we may await with some confidence the result of a struggle in which India is deeply interested.

THE TRANSVAAL INDIANS.

The visit of Mr Polak has excited once more a closer interest in the Transvaal question and associations are being formed for the agitation of the question. It will therefore be opportune to consider the practical aspect of the struggle in the Transvaal and the possibility of help from India. There can be no two opinions outside South Africa, and possibly Hare Street, as to the moral aspects of the question; for it must be remembered that the Indians in the Transvaal are not claiming any political rights, but merely treatment as human beings first, and, next, equality before the law. It is open to the South Africans to exclude Indians altogether, but, once they are admitted, they are morally bound to refrain from a treatment of them which is an extreme and unpardonable outrage on humanity. To degrade any part of the human race to the level of cattle is in the present stage of progress an insult and an offence to the whole of mankind. It would be equally reprehensible to whatever race the humanity so degraded belonged, but the fact that these men are Indians, has made their sufferings a national question to us and a standing reproach to the British people who, out of selfish fear of offending their own kith and kin, allow this outrage to be committed on their own subjects whom they have deprived of all means of self protection. The great glory of the Transvaal Indians is that while men under such circumstances have always sunk into the condition to which they have been condemned and needed others to help them out of the mire, these sons of Bharatavarsha, inheritors of an unexampled moral and spiritual tradition have vindicated the superiority of the Indian people and its civilisation to all other peoples in the globe and all other civilisations by the spirit in which they have refused to recognise the dominance of brute force over the human soul. Stripped of all means of resistance a helpless handful in a foreign land, unaided by India, put off with empty professions of sympathy by English statesmen, they, ignored by humanity, are fighting humanity's battle in the pure strength of the spirit, with no weapon but the moral force of their voluntary sufferings and utter self-sacrifice. Mr. Polak has well said that the Indian nation is being built up in South Africa. The phrase is true in this sense that the supreme example of the moral and spiritual strength which must be behind the formation of the new nation, has been shown first not in India but in South Africa. The passive resistance which we had not the courage and unselfishness to carry out in India, they have carried to the utmost in the Transvaal under far more arduous circumstances, with far less right to hope for success. Whether they win or lose in the struggle, they have contributed far more than their share to the future greatness of their country.

We must consider their chances of success, and though we do not wish to speak words of discouragement, it will not do to hide from ourselves the enormous difficulties in the way. For success, either the Government in England must interfere and compel the Transvaal to do right, or the Transvaal must be stirred by shame and by the interest of the poorer part of the Boer community to reverse the laws, or the Indian Government must intervene to protect its subjects. The first course is unthinkable. It would mean a quarrel with the newly conciliated Transvaal, the marring of the work of which the Liberal Government is justly proud, and a resentment in South Africa which the English ministry will not face for the sake of all India, much less of a handful of Indian coolies and shopkeepers. The poorer Boers will be only inconvenienced, not seriously hurt by the extinction of the Indian shopkeeper, and, in any case, they are not a class who are wont to act politically. The Transvaal Government is not likely to yield to any sense of shame. The Boers are a stark race, stubborn to the death, and the grit they showed in the face of the British Empire, they are also likely to show in this very minor trouble. Nor are they likely to have forgotten the action of the Indians who rewarded the comparative lenience of the Boer Government previous to the war by helping actively in the British attack on the liberty of the Transvaal. With their slow minds and tenacious memories they are a people not swift to forget and forgive; we do not rely greatly on their present professions of friendship to the Power that took from them their freedom, and they are wholly unlikely to put from their minds the unpardonable intrusion of the Indian residents into a quarrel in which they had no concern or stakes.

There remains the Indian Government, and what can the Indian Government do? It can forbid, as has been suggested, Indian coolie recruitment for Natal. This would undoubtedly be a great blow to the planters and they would throw their whole influence into the Indian scale. But, on the other hand, the mass of the Natal whites are full of race prejudice and their desire is for that impossible dream, a white South Africa. A more effective measure would be the suspension of trade relations by the boycott of Colonial goods and the cessation of the importation of Indian raw materials into South Africa. But that is a step which will never be taken. Even if the Indian Government were willing to use any and every means, the decision does not rest with them but with the Government in England, which will not consent to offending the colonies. The Indian Government would no doubt like to see an end of the situation in the Transvaal as it weakens such moral hold as the still have over India, and they would prefer a favourable termination because the return of ruined Indians from the Transvaal will bring home a mass of bitterness, burning sense of wrong and standing discontent trained in the most strenuous methods of passive resistance. And many of them are Mahomedans.

The one favourable factor in favour of the Transvaal Indians is their own spiritual force and the chance of its altering the conditions by sheer moral weight. It is India's duty to aid them by financial succour which they sorely need and the rich men of the country can easily afford, by the heartening effect of public and frequently expressed moral sympathy and by educating the whole people of India literate and illiterate in an accurate knowledge of what is happening in the Transvaal. This is the only help India can give to her children over the seas so long as she is not master of her own destinies.

THE NATIONAL VALUE OF ART.

IV

—ooo—

We now come to the kernel of the subject, the place of art in the evolution of the race and its value in the education and actual life of a nation. The first question is whether the sense of the beautiful has any effect on the life of a nation. It is obvious, from what we have already written, that the manners, the social culture and the restraint in action and expression which are so large a part of national prestige and dignity and make a nation admired like the French, loved like the Irish or respected like the higher-class English, is based essentially on the sense of form and beauty, of what is correct, symmetrical, well-adjusted, fair to the eye and pleasing to the imagination. The absence of these qualities is a source of national weakness. The rudeness, coarseness and vulgar violence of the ordinary Englishman, the overbearing brusqueness and selfishness of the Prussian have greatly hampered those powerful nations in their dealings with foreigners, dependencies and even their own friends, allies, colonies. We all know what a large share the manner and ordinary conduct of the average and of the vulgar Anglo-Indian has had in bringing about the revolt of the Indian, accustomed through ages to courtesy, dignity and the amenities of an equal intercourse, against the mastery of an obviously coarse and selfish community. Now the sense of form and beauty, the correct, symmetrical, well-adjusted, fair and pleasing is an artistic sense and can best be fostered in a nation by artistic culture of the perceptions and sensibilities. It is noteworthy that the two great nations who are most hampered by the defect of these qualities in action are also the least imaginative, poetic and artistic in Europe. It is the South German who contributes the art, poetry and music of Germany, the Celt and Norman who produce great poets and a few great artists in England without altering the characteristics of the dominant Saxon. Music is even more powerful in this direction than Art and by the perfect expression of harmony insensibly steepens the man in it. And it is noticeable that England has hardly produced a single musician worth the name. Plato in his Republic has dwelt with extraordinary emphasis on the importance of music in education; as is the music to which a people is accustomed, so, he says in effect, is the character of that people. The importance of painting and sculpture is hardly less. The mind is profoundly influenced by what it sees and, if the eye is trained from the days of childhood to the contemplation and understanding of beauty, harmony and just arrangement in line and colour, the tastes, habits and character will be insensibly trained to follow a similar law of beauty, harmony and just arrangement in the life of the adult man. This was the great importance of the universal proficiency in the arts and crafts or the appreciation of them which was prevalent in ancient Greece, in certain European ages, in Japan and in the better days of our own history. Art galleries cannot be brought into every home, but, if all the appointments of our life and furniture of our homes are things of taste and beauty, it is inevitable that the habits, thoughts and feelings of the people should be raised, ennobled, harmonised, made more sweet and dignified.

A similar result is produced on the emotions by the study of beautiful or noble art. We have spoken of the purification of the heart, the chittasudhi, which Aristotle assigned as the essential office of poetry, and have pointed out that it is done in poetry by the detached and disinterested enjoyment of the eight rasas or forms of emotional aestheticism which make up life, unalloyed by the disturbance of the lower self-regarding passions. Painting and sculpture work in the same direction by different means. Art sometimes uses the same means as poetry but cannot do it to the same extent because it has not the movement of poetry; it is fixed, still, it expresses only a given moment, a given point in space and cannot move freely through time and region. But it is precisely this stillness, this calm, this fixity which gives its separate value to Art. Poetry raises the emotions and gives each its separate delight. Art stills the emotions and teaches them the delight of a restrained and limited satisfaction;—this indeed was the characteristic that the Greeks, a nation of artists far more artistic than poetic, tried to bring into their poetry. Music deepens the emotions and harmonises them with each other. Between them music, art and poetry are a perfect education for the soul; they make and keep its movements purified, self-controlled, deep and harmonious. These therefore are agents which cannot profitably be neglected by humanity on its onward march or degraded to the mere satisfaction of sensuous pleasure which will disintegrate rather than build the character. They are, when properly used, great educating, edifying and civilising forces.

CHAPTER XI.

The day had dawned. That unpeopled forest, so long dark and silent, now grew full of light, blissful with the cooing and calling of the birds. In that delightful dawn, that joyous forest, that "Monastery of Bliss" Satyananda, seated on a deerskin, was performing his morning devotions. Jivananda sat near. It was at such a time that Bhavananda appeared with Mahendra Singha behind. The ascetic without a word continued his devotions and no one ventured to utter a sound. When the devotions were finished, Bhavananda and Jivananda saluted him and with humility seated themselves after taking the dust of his feet. Then Satyananda beckoned to Bhavananda and took him outside. What conversation took place between them, we do not know, but on the return of the two into the temple the ascetic, with compassion and laughter in his countenance, said to Mohendra, "My son, I have been greatly distressed by our misfortune; it was only by the grace of the Friend of the poor and miserable that I was able to rescue your wife and daughter last night." The ascetic then told Mohendra the story of Kalyani's rescue and said at the end, "Come, let me take you where they are."

The ascetic in front, Mohendra behind entered into the inner precincts of the temple. Mohendra beheld a wide and lofty hall. Even in this cheerful dawn glad with the youth of the morning when the neighbouring groves glittered in the sunshine as if set and studded with diamonds, in this great room there was almost a gloom as of night. Mohendra could not at first see what was in the room but by gazing and gazing and still gazing he was able to distinguish a huge image of the four-armed Vishnu, bearing the shell, the discus, the club, the lotus-blossom, adorned with the jewel Constoobh on his breast; in front the discus called Sudarshan the Beautiful seemed visibly to be whirling round. Two huge headless images representing Madhu and Kaitabh were painted before the figure, as if bathed in their own blood. On the left stood Lakshmi with flowing locks garlanded with wreaths of hundred-petalled lotuses, as if distressed with fear. On the right stood Saraswati surrounded by books, musical instruments, the incarnate strains and symphonies of music. On Vishnu's lap sat an image of enchanting beauty, lovelier than Lakshmi and Saraswati, more splendid with opulence and lordship. The Gandharva and Kinnara and God and elf and giant paid her homage. The ascetic asked Mohendra in a voice of deep solemnity and awe "Can you see all?" "Yes" replied Mohendra.

"Have you seen what is in the lap of Vishnu?" asked the ascetic.

"Yes", answered Mohendra, "who is she?"

"It is the Mother".

"What mother?"

"She whose children we are," replied the ascetic.

"Who is she?"

"In time you will recognise her. Cry 'Hail to the Mother!' Now come, you shall see."

The ascetic took Mohendra into another room. There he saw an image of Jagaddhatrî, Protectress of the world, wonderful, perfect, rich with every ornament. "Who is she?" asked Mohendra.

The Brahmacharin replied, "The Mother as she was."

"What is that?" asked Mohendra.

"She trampled underfoot the elephants of the forest and all wild beasts and in the haunt of the wild beasts she erected her lotus throne. She was covered with every ornament, full of laughter and beauty. She was in hue like the young sun, splendid with all opulence and empire. Bow down to the Mother."

Mohendra saluted reverently the image of the Motherland as the protectress of the world. The Brahmacharin then showed him a dark underground passage and said, "Come by this way." Mohendra with some alarm followed him. In a dark room in the bowels of the earth an insufficient light entered from some unperceived outlet. By that faint light he saw an image of Kali."

The Brahmacharin said, "Look on the Mother as she now is."

Mohendra said in fear, "It is Kali."

"Yes, Kali enveloped in darkness, full of blackness and gloom. She is stripped of all, therefore naked. Today the whole country is a burial ground, therefore is the Mother garlanded with skulls. Her own Good she tramples under her feet. Alas, my Mother!"

The tears began to stream from the ascetic's eyes.

"Why," asked Mohendra, "has she in her hands the club and the skull?"

"We are the Children, we have only just given weapons into our Mother's hands. Cry 'Hail to the Mother!'"

Mohendra said Bande mataam and bowed down to Kali.

THE BIRTH OF SIN.

LUCIFER SIRIOTH.

—o—o—

LUCIFER.

What mighty and ineffable desire
Impels thee, Sirioth? Thy accustomed calm
Is potently subverted and the eyes
That were a god's in sweet tranquillity,
Confess a human warmth, a troubled glow.

SIRIOTH.

Lucifer, son of Morning, Angel! thou
Art mightiest of the architects of fate.
To thee is given with thy magic gaze
Compelling mortals as thou leanest sublime
From heaven's lucent walls, to sway the world.
Is thy felicity of lesser date,
Prince of the patient and untiring gods,
The gods who work? Dost thou not ever feel Angelic weariness usurp the place
Where the great flame and the august desire
Were wont to urge thee on? To me it seems That our eternity is far too long
For service and there is a word, a thought,
More godlike.

LUCIFER.

Sirioth, I will speak the word.
Is it not Power?

SIRIOTH.

No, Lucifer, 'tis Love.

LUCIFER.

Love? It was love that for a trillion years
Gave me the instinct and immense demand
For service, for activity. It fades.
Another and more giant passion comes Striding upon me. I behold the world
Immeasurably vast, I see the heavens
Full of an azure joy and majesty,
I see the teeming millions of the stars.
Sirioth, how came the Master of the world
To be the master? Did He seize control
Pushing some ancient weaker sovereign down
From sway inmemorable? Did He come
By peaceful ways, permission or inheritance,
To what He is to-day? Or if indeed
He is for ever and for ever rules,
Are there no bounds to His immense domain,
No obscure corner of unbounded space
Forgotten by His fate, that I may seize
And make myself an empire as august,
Enjoy a like eternity of rule?

SIRIOTH.

Angel, these thoughts are mighty as thyself.
But wilt thou then rebel? If He be great
To conquer and to punish, what of Thee?
Eternity of dreadful poignant pain
May be thy fate and not eternal rule,

LUCIFER.

Better than still to serve desirelessly,
Pursued by a compulsion dull and fierce,
Looking through all vast time for one brief hour
Of rest, of respite, but instead to find Iron necessity and pant in vain
For space, for room, for freedom.

SIRIOTH.

Thou intendest?

LUCIFER.

Sirioth, I do not yet intend; I feel.

SIRIOTH.

For me the sense of active force within
Set me to work, as the stars move, the sun
Resistless flames through space, the stormwind runs.

But I have felt a touch as sweet as spring,
And I have heard a music of delight
Maddening the heart with the sweet honied stabs
Of delicate intolerable joy.
Where, where is One to feel the answering bliss?
Lucifer, thou from love beganst thy toil.
What love?

LUCIFER.

Desire august to help, to serve.

SIRIOTH.

That is not mine. To embrace, to melt and mix
Two beings into one, to roll the spirit Tumbling into a surge of common joy,—
'Tis this I seek.

LUCIFER.

Will He permit?

SIRIOTH.

A bar

I feel, a prohibition. Some one used
A word I could not grasp and called it sin.

LUCIFER.

The word is new, even as these things are.

SIRIOTH.

I know not who he was. He laughed and said
"Sin, sin is born into the world, revolt
And change, in Sirioth and in Lucifer,
The evening and the morning star. Rejoice,
O world!" And I beheld as in a dream
Leaping from out thy brain and into mine
A woman beautiful, of grandiose mien,
Yet terrible, alarming and instinct
With nameless menace. And the world was full
With clashing and with cries. It seemed to me
Angels and Gods and men strove violently
To touch her robe, to occupy the place
Her beautiful and ominous feet had trod,
Crying, "Daughter of Lucifer, be ours,
O sweet, adorable and mighty Sin!"
Therefore I came to thee.

LUCIFER.

Sirioth, await

Her birth, if she must be. For this I know,
Necessity rules all the infinite world,
And even He perhaps submits unknown
To a compulsion. When the time is ripe,
We will consult once more what we shall do.

INDIAN ART AND INDUSTRY.

MR. HAVEL'S VIEW.

THE MORAL FACTOR IN THE MACHINE.
It should be obvious to anyone who studies carefully the facts I have given that it is either stupendous folly or wickedness to waste the inherited skill of the Indian village weaver by forcing him into power-loom factories as a means of educating him in the science of modern industry. It is usual to draw a distinction between the "moral" and "material" progress of India, though the progress which is not moral is not real progress. The moral factor dominates even the machine.

An interesting illustration of this is being shown in the streets of London at the present moment, one which is very pertinent to the question of Indian industrial development, especially to the revival of the great hand-loom industry. The handsome cab and other horse-drawn vehicles are rapidly being superseded in the streets of London by motor vehicles. It might be supposed that here was a case in which the advantages of capitalism and of the centralisation of industry would become clearly evident. With a horse-drawn vehicle it is easy to understand that the personal interest of the driver and his kindness towards his horses are most important economic factors which give the small proprietor an advantage over the joint-stock company. But when the automatic machine takes the place of the living animal it might be imagined that these factors would be almost entirely eliminated, and that all the advantages would be on the side of the owners of large capital and great centralised organisations controlling a large number of motor vehicles. But so far from this being the case, it is the small proprietor, the owner of one or two of these motor vehicles who is gaining the advantage.

An interesting article in the Morning Post explain the reason for this. The moral factor rules even the motor cab. "The future of the taximeter cab proposition in the Metropolis," says the writer, "presents a very interesting problem. Doubtless the general impression is that only the very large cab companies will stand chance of surviving. On first-hand investigation of the facts, however, leads one to precisely the opposite conclusion. The profitable running of motor-cab can be achieved only by conscientiousness on the part of the driver and by a voluntary attention to a number of details such as cannot possibly be undertaken in any vast organisation where a cab is merely a cab and a driver is merely a man, without, as it were, individuality. For example, in a large cab company, if a man takes a holiday his vehicle is naturally not kept idle, but is taken out by another driver. Anybody who knows anything of machinery will realise at once that for a vehicle to be driven by two distinct drivers is ruinous. Again, how is any big company to check the manner in which the drivers

"slap the cabs out," jamming on the brakes and doing all sorts of dashing performances that they would certainly never indulge in, if the machines were their own property. In many cases the whole difference in running a motor-cab at a loss or a profit lies in whether you tear your tyres by the abuse of the brakes resulting from reckless driving." The writer goes on to show how the big companies, so far from getting a choice of the best drivers, only get those that the small proprietors do not desire to employ. The small proprietors earn more themselves, and thus can afford to pay their employees better wages than the big companies give. Their employees in their turn, knowing the establishment is worked on a small scale, handle the machine with care in place of abusing it, because they know that if it goes out of work they go out of work also. These cabmen of the small proprietors are thrifty, sober men whose object it is to save money until they have sufficient to become small proprietors themselves. "Manufacturers state that there are no clients they trust more willingly than a cambman. . . . This development of the small proprietor and the honest cab driver with enterprise is one of considerable interest. They are likely to form a class that will increase considerably. The financial future for the large cab companies is not bright, for the capital sunk in them is enormous and, in the main, every extra machine that is put on the road does not so much bring in additional receipts as tend to reduce the takings of the other cabs of the company on the road. One allows that in regard to repair works, motor-house facilities and so forth, there are all the materials and there is all the special accommodation that can be desired. But these are not the only essentials for financial success and the small man in more or less of a make-shift stable can for many reasons make far more profit per cab than the large companies."

The article further explains in detail, how the big company system tends to make the motor cabmen not only careless and idle workers, but deliberately dishonest in their dealings with their employers. Like the power-loom factory system his over-centralisation of work is economically unsound because it demoralises the workers. No progress is possible, either in art or in industry, when the moral factor is ignored. The Swadeshi movement will stand or fall not by its success as a political manoeuvre nor by the increase it brings to the number of joint-stock trading companies and to the fatness of their dividends, but by its power to help in the moral uplifting of the Indian workmen. So far as I have been able to observe, it has hitherto done more towards putting money into the pockets of middle class shareholders by the usual processes of Western commercialism, than towards the promotion of economic and moral efficiency on the part of the Indian handicraftsman. It is true that the demand for Swadeshi manufactures has kept the village weavers busy for a time and sent many unemployed back to their looms. This is good, so far as it goes and as long as it lasts. But unless Swadeshi reformers work hard to teach the village weavers to organise themselves and to improve their mechanical methods, how long will the Indian hand-craftsman be able to stand against the "Swadeshi" power-loom and large handloom factories which are being multiplied day by day to help the middle class Indian capitalist to make larger profits? One hears much in the Indian Press about Swadeshi factories and joint-stock companies, but very little of Indian handicraft which is a greater moral factor than all of these.

India will cease to be India but will not, in the long run gain a single rupee by ignoring the moral factor in her industrial organisation. The modern industrial system in Europe is in a great measure a temporary expedient based on the transitional character or imperfection of modern scientific developments. If India is to be spared in future generations from the great social conflict which now threatens Europe, her industrial reformers must look to the future, and not to the present, of European progress. India should lead and not follow.

DR. COOMARSWAMY'S VIEW.

The results of European commercial production by means of labour-saving machinery are seen in Increased production; and Increased profit to the capitalist and not less. Therefore under the commercial system, it is no longer demand that regulates supply, but production that forces a market; and machinery has enabled the capitalist to do this to the fullest extent. The commercial method of commercialism is that to create want in order to have the opportunity of profiting by the filling of it.

Increased commercial production under the Western system absolutely forbids

a union of Art with Labour, which union is the essential characteristic of all craftsmanship. It is no longer possible for culture and refinement to come to the workmen through his work. It must be won, if won at all, in spite of his work; he must seek them in a brief hour snatched from rest and sleep, at the expense of life itself. Further, he has not the even capacity for idling, but must continually seek amusement and excitement. There can, in short, be no quality of leisure in his work.

The results of labour-saving machinery have been less intelligent work for the producer. Not merely is the workman, through division of labour, no longer able to make any whole thing; not only is he confined to making small parts of things, but it is impossible for him to improve his position, or to win reward for excellence in the craft itself. Under Eastern guild conditions, it was possible and usual for the apprentice to rise through all the grades of knowledge and experience to the position of a master-craftsman. But take any such trade as carpet-making under modern conditions by power looms. The operator has no longer to design or to weave in and out the threads with his own fingers. He is employed in reality not as a carpet-weaver, but as the tender of a machine. He may rise to a higher place, it is true,—but it is to the place of a man responsible for the successful running of many machines by many men. That craft is for him destroyed as a means of culture, and the community has lost one more man's intelligence. For it is obviously futile to attempt to build up by evening classes and free libraries, what the whole of a man's work is for ever breaking down. It is instructive to compare the still living but fast disappearing relics of the union of Art with Labour in the East with the results of Western endeavours through education and free libraries to restore that general culture which cannot under commercialism exist. ## THEOSOPHY AND HINDUISM.

The Theosophical Society in India has passed through three phases. In Madame Blavatsky's time, it was known as a Buddhist movement, for both the founders were Buddhists by conversion. But both were uncompromising enemies of Christianity and professed regard for Hinduism, and made the Theosophical Society popular. The second period commenced with Mrs. Besant's coming to India. She came with a well-known reputation behind her as that of an anti-Christian and a Free-thinker, one who had suffered much from the hands of bigoted Christians. The simple Hindus welcomed her as their champion against their Christian assailants. The simple Hindus welcomed her as their champion against their Christian. Their enthusiasm reached a burning point when they learned that she had assumed Hinduism, and under the guidance of a well-known mystic of the United Provinces of Agra and Oudh was initiated into Hindu modes of worship. This lasted for some years. It was this phase of the theosophical Society that saw the establishment of the Hindu College in Benares. Money poured in whenever she appealed to Hindus for it. But that phase has also passed. The Theosophical Society has now come under the influence of one who at one time was a Christian clergyman in holy orders, and is now a Buddhist. But he has not forgotten his old love; and many think that he is a Christian missionary in disguise. Since Mrs. Besant came under his influence and returned the symbol of her once Ishta Devi to her Hindu teacher, she has become suddenly popular with the Christian community; and in her recent tour in England her lectures were fully reported in a widely circulated Christian paper called the Christian Commonwealth. No wonder that she is taken in England as a free-lance Christian missionary and her Hindu College as an institution to teach pure Christianity. Nor has she done anything tidisabuse the British public of this notion. On the contrary, she has been lecturing there on the coming of Christ. This new Theosophical revelation vouchsafed to the gentleman already referred to is that the Christ will take birth soon, within the life-time of many of us, and that the Theosophical Society is meant to clear the way for him; so that the public may not discard him, as he was discarded when he last appeared. If a Moslem preaches the near approach of the Mehdi we call him a fanatic, but when Mrs. Besant preaches the coming of Christ there are Hindus who call themselves orthodox, who swallow the stuff with avidity. No wonder if the Hindu College is looked upon with suspicion by all Hindus who are not under the glamour of this divinely gifted orator. We are sincere admirers of Mrs. Besant but if she goes on preaching the coming of Christ to Hindus as she has done in England, and in some places in India also, the days of the Theosophical Society in India are numbered, especially among the Hindus. As regards the Hindu College, Benares, it is high time to place it under some truly orthodox Hindu. We have nothing to say against the present Principal. He is very popular with the boys and is an honorary worker. We are all grateful to him, and to devoted workers like him, but a Hindu College is better under a born Hindu who is also orthodox.

DEMAND FOR INDIAN COTTON.

It seems likely that the demand for Indian cotton will be exceptionally great when the exporting season sets in. Not only is there a serious shortage in the American crop but Egypt is expected to supply 50,000 tons less than last year. The ravages of the boll worm seem to be chiefly responsible for the smaller field in the Lower Nile Valley. It may be noted as an extra-ordinary development arising from the critical position of the trade that American Mills are said to be enquiring for Indian cotton.

A NEW INDUSTRY FOR INDIA.

Now that ostrich farming is one of the new industries that promise to be introduced into India at an early date, as a result of the commercial awakening, it may be interesting to glance at the possibilities of this venture. For the purposes of comparison we have to go to South Africa for a few facts for it is in that country that the ostrich feather industry has been brought to its highest pitch of perfection; and, by careful selection, birds have been there produced that sell for as much as £1,000 each, writes the "Pioneer." Such costly specimens, of course, are for breeding purposes. Taken all round, the birds average about £5 each. In one district alone, however, there are farms containing some 50,000 ostriches which, at £5 per head, represent quite a tidy capity outlay. But the industry is believed to be a very profitable one. The demand for good feathers is enormous and the supply is deficient. Hence it comes about that as much as £10 is often paid for a single feather of the right size, colour and quality. The trade, moreover, is increasing rapidly. In 1904, for instance, export from Cape Colony amounted to 457,49 lbs. Whereas the figures for last year were 561,469 lbs. It takes a lot of feathers to make up that weight, but the cry is always for more. The recent ostrich feather auction, held in London in September last, was, it is claimed, the largest on record, the weight of feathers disposed of being 114,000 lbs. against 105,100 lbs. at the corresponding sale in September 1908. It is reasonably clear, therefore, that this trade is both a growing and a profitable one. It requires a certain amount of capital to start with certainly but otherwise it is easy to conduct and is quite "clean," as no pain is inflicted on the birds during the plucking season. The "plucking" fact is simply a clipping of the wing feathers. There are in India patches of territory that closely approach in climatic conditions the ostrich farming portions of Cape Colony, and from enquiries recently made there would appear no special reasons why the ostrich feather industry should not thrive in the right localities.

THE AHMEDABAD OUTRAGE.

The municipal sweeper who was severely injured by the bomb at Ahmedabad is now out of danger though his arm has been amputated. Lord Minto made inquiries about him, and on finding that he was in debt to the Banias has paid off the debt and in addition has made a generous provision for his future.

MR. PAL'S VIEWS ON THE REFORM.

Mr. Bipin Chandra Pal, lecturing at Manchester described Lord Morley's Indian Reform as a bribery calculated to make a section of the people sell their souls for a mess of pottage. The situation in India was boycot on the one hand and repression on the other. Their general policy was to boycott British goods and manufactures, because they knew the weakness of the British character; hence, when the British wounded their feelings, they retaliated by touching their pockets. Though he regretted the recent outbreak of violence, they could not control the impatient spirit of their race, and the question was whether it would be peace or revolution. If the present state of things continued, India would be worse than a second Ireland - It would be new Russia.

LAHORE SEDITION.

Mr. Harrison, Special Magistrate of Lahore, on the 2nd December, took up the sedition case in which Narendra Gopal stands charged with circulating a seditious pamphlet under Section 124 A. Mr. Pitman, Government Advocate, on behalf of the Crown, stated that the accused printed, sold and circulated a seditious book called "Kaumi Ishah" or national reform. Mr. Pitman also put in extracts of a translation from the Allahabad "Swaraj." Mr. Bulakiram, Barrister and father of the accused appeared for the defence. The witnesses were examined by the prosecution including the translator. Mr. Pitman also filed papers relating to the confiscation of the "Inquibah" for proving accused's previous conduct and two copies of "Swaraj" in respect of which a prosecution was pending against the accused at Allahabad. Charges under Section 124A were framed.

The cases against Swaran Singh and Lalchand Falak will be taken up on the 6th instant.

In connection with this trial Kishan Singh, brother of Ajit Singh, was arrested on the 2nd instant.

DARBHANGA ORPHANS.

A representative and well-attended public meeting was held at Bankipore on the 4th instant, to consider the measures to be adopted for the Hindu orphans of the Darbhanga famine. The Honourable Maharaja Tikari presided. In his presidential speech he pointed out how the Collector of Darbhanga had refused to make over the famine orphans to the Hindus on the plea that he had already promised to make them over to a Christian Mission and the consequent indignation caused by it. He was glad to announce that Sir Edward Baker had authorized him to state that the Hindu orphans will not made over to the Christian Mission, but to a respectable Hindu Orphanage or families. Referring to the action of Mr. Egerton Collector of Darbhanga, the Maharaja: "I must say that before committing himself on so important a subject he should have consulted the Head of the Government, as matters of this kind create naturally a very strong impression of an unfavourable kind against the Government which every responsible officer should do his best to obviate. In these troublous times after hearing expression of views on the subject from His Honour the Lieutenant Governor, one may be justified in thinking that no small mischief is done when junior officers arrogate themselves an authority that does not belong to them and make pronouncements which have serious disturbing influences. It would be well if, in the future, such things were avoided." Hindu and Moslem leaders attended the meeting and measures were urged for opening a Hindu orphanage for Behar.

SRI. ROMESH CHANDRA CHAKRAVARTY.

English Edition, bound Re. 1.

THE THEOSOPHIST (conducted by COL. H. S. OLcott, P. T. S.), Madras:—"An excellent publication deserves to be in the hands of every Hindu student who neglects his religion."

THE GUJARATI PUNCH (Ahmedabad):—"In this book are collected the several rules laid down by the Rishis of old to be observed by every Brahmachari. No greater service is rendered to a country than the one which teaches the formation of individual character in the youth of the country. Efforts in the direction of bringing up the posterity in a way that would elevate their mental position which would ultimately work up the way to bring back the country to its good old position are not less needed than Congresses and Conferences. The book should be in the hands of every student."

FACTS AND OPINIONS.

Sir Pherozshah's Resignation.

The resignation of Sir Pherozshah Mehta took all India by surprise. It was as much a cause of astonishment to his faithful friends and henchmen as to the outside world. The speculation and bewilderment have been increased by the solemn mystery in which the Dictator of the Convention has shrouded his reasons for a step so suddenly and painfully embarrassing to the body he created and now rules and protects. A multitude of reasons have been severally alleged for this sudden move in the game by ingenious speculators, but they seem mostly to be figments of the imagination. It was an ingenious guess that Sir Pherozshah has been appointed, as a reward for his great services to the Government, on the India Council and could, therefore, take no farther part in party politics. But until the appointment, if real, is announced, such self-denial is not obligatory, and surely Lord Morley would be quite willing to give his choice ten days grace in order that he might pilot through this crisis in its fortunes a body so useful to the Government as the Convention that is striving this year to meet at Lahore. We ourselves lean to the idea that it is the complications ensuing on the unmasking of the Reforms that are chiefly responsible for the move. The Reforms are exasperating to Hindu sentiment, destructive to popular interests and a blow even to the Loyalist Hindus who were loudest in acclaiming the advent of the millennium. The Bombay leaders cannot accept the Reform without exasperating the people or refuse them without offending the Government. They are in that embarrassing position which is vulgarly called being in a cleft stick. It is not surprising in a tactician of Sir Pherozshah's eminence that, at such a critical juncture, he should prefer to guide the deliberations of the Lahore Convention from behind the veil rather than stand forward and become personally responsible for whatever he may think it necessary to compel the Convention to do. The Bengal Conventionists are already in danger of drifting away from the moorings and the new Regulations have, we believe, created the imminence of another dissension among the remaining faithful. The resignation of Sir Pherozshah makes it easier for the Bengal Moderates to attend the Lahore Congress, and that may not have been absent from the thoughts of the master tactician. But we never thought that Sir Pherozshah would care so much for the co-operation of the Bengalis as to allow Srijut Surendronath to be President, as certain sanguine gentlemen in Bengal seem to have expected. Failing Sir Pherozshah and Mr. Gokhale, who for obvious reasons cannot be put forward so soon after the Benares Presidentship, Mr. Madanmohan Malaviya was evidently the man, and we find accordingly that he has been designated for the succession by the obedient coterie at Bombay. We wait with interest the upshot of this very attractive entanglement and the method by which the Convention will try to wriggle out of the very difficult hole into which Lord Morley has thrust it.

The Council Elections.

The elections for the Reformed Councils, so far as they have proceeded, entirely justify the description of the new bodies which, we gave in our article on the Reforms. The elections for the United Provinces give a fair sample of the results which are sure to obtain all over India. With the exception of two or three gentlemen of the type of Pandit Madan Mohan Malviya, there is none on the Council to represent the educated wealthy, much less the people at large; all the rest are Europeans, Mahomedans and grandees. It is a Council of Notables, not a reformed Legislative Council representing both the Government and the people. In Bengal two gentlemen have been elected who represent the most lukewarm element in the popular party, for S. J. Baikuntanath

Sen and Mr. K. B. Dutt stand not for the new movement in Bengal so much as for the old antiquated Congress politics which Bengal, even in its Moderate element, has left far behind. Behar sends one independent man in Mr. Deep Narayan Singh. All the rest are of the dignified classes who either have no patriotic feelings or dare not express them. It is possible that Sir Edward Baker, in order to remove the stigma of unrepresentative subserviency from his Council, may try to nominate two or three who will help to keep S. J. Baikunthanath and his friend in countenance, but that purely personal grace will not mend matters. The Bengal Council is likely to be an even more select and unrepresentative body than we expected. We counted the District Boards as possible constituencies for representatives of opposition and independent opinion, but, for the most part, they might almost as well as have been preserves for the aristocracy. In East Bengal it is evident that the Councils will be a Mahomedan and European body.

British Unfitness for Liberty

By all Anglo-Indian papers it was triumphantly announced as a conclusive proof of the unfitness of the Indian people for self-government that the Surat Congress should have been broken up by the storming of the platform when passions were highly excited and relations between parties at breaking-point. Every ordinary sign of excitement at a public meeting is telegraphed to England under some such graphic title as "Uproarious proceedings at the Provincial Conference." But if rowdiness is a sign of unfitness for liberty, there is no country so unfit as England itself and logically, as lovers of England, our Anglo-Indian friends ought to pray that Germany, which knows how to sternly stop such disturbances, or Russia, which knows how to punish them, should take charge of England and teach her people respect for law and order. The excitement of the great revolutionary struggle now proceeding in England has already in these few days induced such lawlessness and disorder that it is becoming almost impossible for Conservative speakers to command a public hearing. At first it was the Liberal Minister, Mr. Ure, whose meetings were systematically interrupted and broken up by organised Conservative rowdiness. Since then the Radicals have retaliated with much greater effect, first, with "goodhumoured" interruption, then with more formidable tumult and, finally, we see the temper rising to absolute ferocity. Not only do we read in one telegram of four Conservative meetings which were of a disorderly nature, while Lord Kesteven and Lord Harris were refused a hearing, but the windows at Mr. Ure's last meeting were broken with a battering ram and several of his audience were cut; and the other day a Conservative meeting was broken up, the agent left senseless by his assailants and the candidate only saved by a skilful flight. Nor were the worst excesses of which our young men were accused in the prosecution of the Boycott and picketing, anywhere near the violence and recklessness of which Englishwomen have been systematically guilty during the last few months. Clearly it is time that a more capable nation conquered and took charge of England.

The Lahore Convention.

The prospects of the Lahore Convention seem to be exceedingly clouded. In the matter of the Presidentship the fiat has gone forth from Bombay that Pandit Madan Mohan shall be President and, unless the dissatisfaction with the Mehta leadership has extended itself to the subservient Congress Committees, it is likely that the Bombay nomination will give the lead to the rest of the Conventionist coterie, excepting perhaps Burma and Bengal. The Convention is now at a critical stage of its destinies. Disowned by the Punjab, troubled by strained relations between Bombay and Bengal, it has received the crowning blow from the Government which supports it; its policy has been discredited before the country and once more it has been proved to a disgusted people that the methods of the Conventionists lead to nothing but rebuffs, humiliation and political retrogression in the name of reform. If this body is to survive, there is need of a strong hand and skilful guidance, otherwise the present session is likely to be the last. Already the Convention is becoming the refuge of an out-of-date and vanishing coterie who no longer command the confidence of the country. By its very constitution the Convention has cut itself off from the people and a few men meeting in conclave elect the delegates in the name of an indifferent or hostile public. The dying post in vain strives to intrench itself in this insecure and crumbling fortress. Every day will serve to undermine it more and more and the Nationalists are content to let time and inevitable tendency do their work for them. Only by a radical self-purification and change of policy can the Convention hope to survive.

THE MODERATE MANIFESTO.

The practical exclusion of the educated classes, other than Mahomedans, landholders and titled grandees, from the new Councils and the preference of Mahomedans to Hindus has rung the death-knell of the old Moderate politics in India. If the Moderate party is to survive, it has to shift its base and alter its tactics. If its leaders ignore the strong dissatisfaction and disillusionment felt by educated Hindus all over India or if they tamely acquiesce in a reform which seems to have been deliberately framed in order to transfer political preponderance from Hindus to Mahomedans and from the representatives of the educated class to the landed aristocracy, they will very soon find themselves leaders without a following. The Moderate party at present is held together merely by the prestige and personal influence of the small secret Junta of influential men who lead it, not by any settled convictions or intelligent policy. The personalities of Mr. Gokhale and Sir Pherozshah Mehta in Bombay, of S. J. Surendranath Banerji and S. J. Bhupendranath Bose in Bengal, of Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya in the United Provinces, of Mr. Krishnaswamy Aiyar in Madras constitute Moderatism in their respective provinces. What these old and respected leaders decide in their close and secret deliberations is accepted, no longer without cavilling, but still with a somewhat reluctant acquiescence by their party. But the public mind has now been too deeply stirred for the leaders to ignore the opinion of the country. The resignation by Sir Pherozshah Mehta of his Presidentship of the Lahore Convention following so soon after the publication of the Regulations, the speech of Mr. Gokhale at the Deccan Sabha and the manifesto issued by the Calcutta Moderates are the first signs of the embarrassment felt by the heads of the party. There can be no doubt that they have allowed themselves to be tools in the hands of the officials and were not prepared for being thrown overboard as the sole recompense.

The speech of Mr. Gokhale shows the line along which the Bombay Moderate leaders desire to pilot their followers. It is the line chalked out for them by Lord Minto and other Anglo-Indian advisers. A great deal of feeling has been created against Mr. Gokhale throughout the country by his justification of the "stern and relentless" measures employed by the Government against the Nationalist party and the Boycott movement and by the Bombay Government's use of the new repressive legislation to crush a personal adversary in Mr. Gokhale's interests. The Moderate leader has with a belated adroitness used the disqualification of the Nationalist, Mr. N. C. Kelkar, to rehabilitate himself, if that be possible, by championing the cause of a political opponent. We do not know whether Mahratta sentiment will be shallow enough to be misled by this manœuvre. The disqualification of Mr. Kelkar is an incident we welcome as a gain to our cause. On the other hand, apart from the empty formula of protest and a formal recognition of the sentiment of the country against the defects of the measure, the speech is merely a repetition of Lord Minto's appeal to give this vicious, injurious and insulting measure a fair chance,—on the very shadowy possibility to which the Moderate leaders still profess to cling, that all this alloy will be changed to pure gold in the next three years. Mr. Gokhale is still the political henchman of Lord Minto and echoes his sentiments with a pathetic fidelity.

The manifesto of the Moderate leaders in Calcutta is of more importance. The Bengal veterans have not yet lost caste by publicly turning against their countrymen and approving Government repression; they still keep some touch with public sentiment and have not yielded body and soul to the rallying call of Lord Morley. Even so fervid an Anti-Nationalist as Dr. Rasbehari Ghose, to the great discontent and surprise of the Englishman, has signed the document. The manifesto shows a clear sense of the short comings of the measure of reform which was acclaimed with such gratitude by these same able politicians when the skeleton had not been filled in with its present generous padding. It is to be regretted that a false note has been struck by the reference to the modification of one clause and the complaint that the "relief" thus afforded was insignificant and many distinguished men would still be barred out of the Council. Are the distinguished men of Bengal paupers cringing for personal doles that this kind of language should be used or this kind of argument advanced? We cannot congratulate the framer of the manifesto either on the form or the matter of this unhappy sentence. The recognition of class and creed as a basis of representation, the exclusion of popular interests in favour of the dignified elements in the community, the illusory nature of the non-official majority, the limitation of the functions of the Councils to criticism without control and the denial of freedom of election are the real gravamen of the charges against Lord Morley's measure, and the barring out of certain distinguished men is a mere incident which can certainly be used in newspaper articles and speeches as an indication of motive, but ought not to have been introduced into a grave document of this nature. The effective representation of the people the preservation of sound democratic principles of representation in the formation of the electorates and freedom of election are the objects disinterested and patriotic men should hold before them, not the privilege of entry into the Councils for distinguished men.

But while the manifesto contains a full and exhaustive statement of the objections to the Reform, it is silent as the grave with regard to the practical methods which the Moderate leaders propose to adopt in order to bring about real reform. Will they follow the Bombay lead? Will they strike out a line of their own? At the close of the manifesto there is a pious expression of indomitable hope characteristic of the Moderate party, the party of obstinate illusions; the signatories, it seems, do not despair of the Government seeing the error of their ways and modifying the regulations so as to restore Lord Morley's original scheme. There is something heroic in this desperate absence of despair. It reminds us of the most heroic passage in Roman history when, after the massacre of Cannae, the beaten general and cause of the disaster returned an almost solitary fugitive to Rome, preferring flight to a soldier's death, and the whole Roman senate came out to meet him and thank him that he had not despaired of his country. What is it that the Moderate leaders hope? Do they hope that the regulations will be so modified as to admit all the distinguished men whom they are interested in seeing at their back in the Councils? Or do they hope that the fundamental defects we have enumerated will be removed by a sort of spontaneous repentance and confession of original sin on the part of the Government? If so, what other basis have they for their incurable hopefulness except the faculty of the chameleon for living on unsubstantial air? The modifications of which they speak are not modifications, but a radical alteration of the whole spirit and details of the measure.

We also do not despair of a wholesome change in the attitude of the Government, but we do not believe in political miracles. There is no progress in politics except by the play of cause and effect, and if we want a particular effect, we must first create the suitable and effective cause. The only cause that can bring about so radical a change in the attitude of the Government by the failure of this misbegotten scheme and the necessity of substituting one better conceived and more liberal. And the only way to bring about the failure and the consequent necessity is to focus the whole opposition of the Hindu interest and the popular interest, with whatever Mahomedan assistance we can get, in a movement of abstention from the present Councils and an active agitation by effective means for the recognition of the great democratic principles that have been ignored and the formation of a new scheme after consultation with the popular leaders. This, it seems to us, is a legitimate sphere of activity for a strong and self-respecting Moderate party. But if they stultify themselves by accepting in any way a measure designed to reduce them to nullity or impotence, they will commit suicide. Their empty protests against the defects of the Bill will be recognized as meaningless, for they will have deprived themselves of their only leverage for remedying the defects. The country has no room any longer for a party of mere sanguine expectancy and helpless dependence on the will of superior power. Moderatism at present is a mass of ill-defined aspirations, ungrounded hopes and helpless methods leading to perpetual and repeated disappointment, increasing weakness and deepening self-discontent. No party vowed to these uninspiring methods and depressing experiences can hope to survive at a time when political life is becoming more and more vivid and real. The Moderates must give up their vague unpracticality and adopt a definite aim, a distinct programme, effective methods.

We do not know whether the Moderate leaders could ever bring themselves so far as to stand out for a real measure of control as distinguished from a wider power of criticism. But there is no reason why they should not make up their minds to fight for a popular electorate based on education, exclusive of class and religious distinctions, free election and an elective majority, and refuse to be satisfied with less. In that case, the Nationalist party would represent a more advanced force standing out for a measure of effective control and a democratic electorate based on literacy, in addition to the Moderate demands. If, on the other hand, the Moderates would also accept control as a necessary factor of any political settlement, Moderate and Nationalist would again come into line and stand on a common platform, the only distinction being that one party would accept the settlement as a satisfactory solution for the present, while the other would regard it merely as an instrument for developing autonomy. But while the exclusory clauses of the Moderate Convention's Constitution remain, this drawing together is not possible, or, if it were possible, could not be sincere and effective. Those clauses are a sign and pledge of the Mehta-Morley alliance and ratify the policy of which Mr. Gokhale's Poona speech was the expression, the policy of rallying the Moderates to the Government's support and crushing the Nationalists.

THE NATIONAL VALUE OF ART.

V

The value of art in the training of intellectual faculty is also an important part of its utility. We have already indicated the double character of intellectual activity, divided between the imaginative creative and sympathetic or comprehensive intellectual centres on the one side and the critical, analytic and penetrative on the other. The latter are best trained by science, criticism and observation, the former by art, poetry, music, literature and the sympathetic study of man and his creations. These make the mind quick to grasp at a glance, subtle to distinguish shades, deep to reject shallow self-sufficiency, mobile, delicate, swift, intuitive. Art assists in this training by raising images in the mind which it has to understand not by analysis, but by self-identification with other minds; it is a powerful stimulator of sympathetic insight. Art is subtle and delicate, and it makes the mind also in its movements subtle and delicate. It is suggestive, and the intellect habituated to the appreciation of art is quick to catch suggestions, mastering not only, as the scientific mind does, that which is positive and on the surface, but that which leads to ever fresh widening and subtilising of knowledge and opens a door into the deeper secrets of inner nature where the positive instruments of science cannot take the depth or measure. This supreme intellectual value of Art has never been sufficiently recognised. Men have made language, poetry, history, philosophy agents for the training of this side of intellectuality, necessary parts of a liberal education, but the immense educative force of music, painting and sculpture has never been recognized. They have been thought to be bye-paths of the human mind, beautiful and interesting, but not necessary, therefore intended for the few. Yet the universal impulse to enjoy the beauty and attractiveness of sound, to look at and live among pictures, colours, forms ought to have warned mankind of the superficiality and ignorance of such a view of these eternal and important occupations of human mind. The impulse, denied proper training and self-purification, has spent itself on the trivial, gaudy, sensuous, cheap or vulgar instead of helping man upward by its powerful aid in the evocation of what is best and highest in intellect as well as in character, emotion and the aesthetic enjoyment and regulation of life and manners. It is difficult to appreciate the waste and detriment involved in the low and debased level of enjoyment to which the artistic impulses are condemned in the majority of mankind.

But beyond and above this intellectual utility of Art, there is a higher use, the noblest of all, its service to the growth of spirituality in the race. European critics have dwelt on the close connection of the highest developments of art with religion, and it is undoubtedly true that in Greece, in Italy, in India, the greatest efflorescence of a national Art has been associated with the employment of the artistic genius to illustrate or adorn the thoughts and fancies of the temples and instruments of the national religion. This was not because Art is necessarily associated with the outward forms of religion, but because it was in the religion that men's spiritual aspirations centred themselves. Spirituality is a wider thing than formal religion and it is in the service of spirituality that Art reaches its highest self-expression. Spirituality is a single word expressive of three lines of human aspiration towards divine knowledge, divine love and joy, divine strength, and that will be the highest and most perfect Art which, while satisfying the physical requirements of the aesthetic sense, the laws of formal beauty, the emotional demand of humanity, the portrayal of life and outward reality, as the best European Art satisfies these requirements, reaches beyond them and expresses inner spiritual truth, the deeper not obvious reality of things, the joy of God in the world and its beauty and desirableness and the manifestation of divine force and energy in phenomenal creation. This is what Indian Art alone attempted thoroughly and in the effort it often dispensed, either deliberately or from impatience, with the lower, yet not negligible perfections which the more material European demanded. Therefore Art has flowed in two separate streams in Europe and Asia, so diverse that it is only now that the European aesthetic sense has so far trained itself as to begin to appreciate the artistic conventions, aims and traditions of Asia. Asia's future development will unite these two streams in one deep and grandiose flood of artistic self-expression perfecting the aesthetic evolution of humanity.

But if Art is to reach towards the highest, the Indian tendency must dominate. The spirit is that in which all the rest of the human being reposes, towards which it returns and the final self-revelation of which is the goal of humanity. Man becomes God, and all human activity reaches its highest and noblest when it succeeds in bringing body, heart and mind into touch with spirit. Art can express eternal truth, it is not limited to the expression of form and appearance. So wonderfully has God made the world that a man using a simple combination of lines, an unpretentious harmony of colours, can use this apparently insignificant medium to suggest absolute and profound truths with a perfection which language labours with difficulty to reach. What Nature is, what God is, what man is can be triumphantly revealed in stone or on canvas.

Behind a few figures, a few trees and rocks the supreme Intelligence, the supreme Imagination, the supreme Energy lurks, acts, feels, is, and, if the artist has the spiritual vision, he can see it and suggest perfectly the great mysterious Life in its manifestations brooding in action, active in thought, energetic in stillness, creative in repose, full of a mastering intention in that which appears blind and unconscious. The great truths of religion, science, metaphysics, life, development, become concrete, emotional, universally intelligible and convincing in the hands of the master of plastic Art, and the soul of man, in the stage when it is rising from emotion to intellect, looks, receives the suggestion and is uplifted towards a higher development, a diviner knowledge.

So it is with the divine love and joy which pulsates throughout existence and is far superior to alloyed earthly pleasure. Catholic, perfect, unmixed with repulsion, radiating through all things, the common no less than the high, the mean and shabby no less than the lofty and splendid, the terrible and the repulsive no less than the charming and attractive, it uplifts all, purifies all, turns all to love and delight and beauty. A little of this immortal nectar poured into a man's heart transfigures life and action. The whole flood of it pouring in would lift mankind to God. This too Art can seize on and suggest to the human soul, aiding it in its stormy and toilsome pilgrimage. In that pilgrimage it is the divine strength that supports. Shakti, Force, pouring through the universe supports its boundless activities, the frail and tremulous life of the rose no less than the flaming motions of sun and star. To suggest the strength and virile unquerable force of the divine Nature in man and in the outside world, its energy, its calm, its powerful inspiration, its august enthusiasm, its wildness, greatness, attractiveness, to breathe that into man's soul and gradually mould the finite into the image of the Infinite is another spiritual utility of Art. This is its loftiest function, its fullest consummation, its most perfect privilege.

ANANDAMATH.

CHAPTER XI.—(Continued.)

The ascetic said, "Come by this way", and began to ascend another underground passage. Suddenly the rays of the morning sun shone in their eyes and from every side the sweet-voiced family of birds shrilled in song. In a wide temple built in stone of marble they saw a beautifully fashioned image of the Ten-armed Goddess made in gold, laughing and radiant in the light of the early sun. The ascetic saluted the image and said, "This is the Mother as she shall be. Her ten arms are extended towards the ten regions and they bear many a force imaged in her manifold weapons; her enemies are trampled under her feet and the lion on which her foot rests, is busy destroying the foe. Behold her, with the regions for her arms,"—as he spoke, Satyananda began to sob,—"with the regions for her arms, wielder of manifold weapons, trampler down of her foes, with the lion-heart for the steed of her riding; on her right Lakshmi as Prosperity, on her left Speech-giver of learning and science, Kartikeya with her as Strength, Ganesh as Success. Come, let us both bow down to the Mother." Both with lifted faces and folded hands began to cry with one voice. "O auspicious with all well-omened things, O thou ever propitious, who effectest all desire, O refuge of men, three-eyed and fair of hue, O Energy of Nanyan, salutation to thee."

The two men bowed down with awe and love, and when they rose, Mohendra asked in a broken voice, "When shall I see this image of the Mother?" "When all the Mother's sons" replied the Brahmacharin, "learn to call the Mother by that name, on that day the Mother will be gracious to us."

Suddenly Mohendra asked, "Where are my wife and daughter?"

"Come" said the ascetic, "you shall see them."

"I wish to see them once and say farewell."

"Why should you say farewell?"

"I shall take up this mighty vow."

"When will you send them to?"

Mohendra thought for a little and then said, "There is no one in my house and I have no other place. Yet in this time of famine, what other place can I find?"

"The Bengl soaps are the cheapest and best in the market."

"Go out of the temple," said the ascetic "by the way by which you came here. At the door of the temple you will see your wife and child. Up to this moment Kalyani has eaten nothing. You will find articles of food in the place where they are sitting. When you have made her eat, do whatever you please; at present you will not again meet any of us. If this mind of yours holds, at the proper time I shall show myself to you."

Then suddenly by some path unknown the ascetic vanished from the place. Mohendra went forth by the way pointed out to him and saw Kalyani with her daughter sitting in the court of meeting.

Satyananda on his side descended by another underground passage into a secret cellar under the earth. There Jivananda and Bhavananda sat counting rupees and arranging them in piles. In that room gold, silver, copper, diamonds, coral, pearls were arrayed in heaps. It was the money looted on the previous night they were arranging. Satyananda as he entered the room, said, "Jivananda, Mohendra will come to us. If he comes, it will be a great advantage to the Children, for in that case the wealth accumulated in his family from generation to generation will be devoted to the Mother's service. But so long as he is not body and soul devoted to the Mother, do not take him into the order. As soon as the work you have in hand is completed, follow him at various times and when you see it is the proper season, bring him to the temple of Vishnu. And in season, or out of season protect their lives. For even as the punishment of the wicked is the duty of the Children, so is the protection of the good equally their duty."

EPIPHANY.

Majestic, mild, immortally august,
In silence throned, to just and to unjust
One Lord of deep unutterable love,
I saw Him, Shiva, like a brooding dove
Close-winged upon her nest. The outcasts came,
The sinners gathered round that tender Flame,
The demons, by the other fiercer gods
Rejected from their luminous abodes,
Gathered around the Refuge of the lost.
Soft smiling on that wild and grisly host
All who were refugeless, wretched, unloved,
The wicked and the good together moved
Naturally to Him, the Asylum sweet,
And found their heaven at their Master's feet.
The vision changed and in his place there stood
A Terror red as lightning or as blood;
His fierce right hand a javelin advanced
And, as He shook it, earthquake reeling danced
Across the hemisphere, ruin and plague
Rained out of heaven, disasters swift and vague Threatened, a marching multitude of ills.
His foot strode forward to oppress the hills.
And at the vision of His burning eyes
The hearts of men grew faint with dread surmise
Of sin and punishment; their cry was loud,
"O Master of the stormwind and the cloud,
Spare, Rudra, spare. Show us that other form Auspicious, not incarnate wrath and storm."
The God of Wrath, the God of Love are one
Nor least He loves when most He smites. Alone
Who rises above fear and plays with grief,
Defeat and death, inherits full relief
From blindness and beholds the single Form,
Love masking Terror, Peace supporting storm.
The Friend of Man helps him with Life and Death,
Until he knows. Then freed from mortal breath
He feels the joy of the immortal play;
Grief, pain, resentment, terror pass away.
He too grows Rudra fierce, august and dire,
And Shiva, sweet fulfiller of desire.

SEDITION IN LAHORE.

The authorities of the D. A. V. College, Lahore, have, it is alleged, granted "leave of absence" to the professor of the Institution whose house was searched last month along with those of certain persons who are now being prosecuted for sedition at Lahore. The Professor in question had rented the house which had been occupied by the brother of Ajit Singh, and which contained a portion of Kishen Singh's property. The Police searched the house and took away certain papers belonging to the Kishen Singh as well as some papers in the possession of the professor, but, according to the Arya Gazette, he says that some of the documents alleged to have been taken from his belongings were neither in his possession nor belonged to him. Hence the authorities have decided that the professor should not deliver lectures there until the sedition case recently instituted at Lahore have come to end.

SIR P. MEHTA RESIGNS THE CONGRESS PRESIDENCY.

Sir Pherozeshah Mehta has resigned the presidentship of the Lahore Congress. He has sent the following message to Lala Harkishenlal, Chairman of the Reception Committee: "I deeply regret that owing to a combination of unexpected circumstances I am compelled to relinquish the honour of presiding at the Lahore Congress."

Various reasons are assigned regarding the resignation of Sir P. M. Mehta and nothing authentic is available. Lala Harkishen Lal, in reply to urgent enquiries, stated, "Sir P. M. Mehta has not communicated his reasons to us." It is, however, understood that telegraphic negotiations are proceeding between Bombay and Lahore and Mr. Wacha had a long conference with Sir P. M. Mehta this morning. One of the rumours is that the Reception Committee wanted to see in advance the President's speech. As it was not ready the President sent a rough sketch. It is surmised that this rough draft caused dissension.

THE PATIALA SEDITION CASE.

The Punjabi publishes an order by the Maharaja of Patiala stating that pleaders not enrolled by the State are allowed, in the present instance, as an act of special grace but such pleaders must understand that they are only allowed to appear on condition that they do not obstruct or attempt in any way to unnecessarily prolong the proceedings. If the Court finds that this condition is violated, the pleader violating it will be required to retire. The applications on the part of a pleader to appear should be made in writing to the Ijlas-i-khas and specify the particular pleader by name and such permission, if granted, should take effect only upon the Court taking cognisance of the case on the date of which due notice will be given to all concerned. The Court will exercise direction as to the number of pleaders who will be permitted to address the Court at the close of the case or upon any point arising during the proceedings.

An influential appeal has been issued for financial help for the Arya Samajist accused in the case. It is said that several well-known Arya Samaj pleaders will appear for the accused without any remuneration.

The cases in which Lalchand Falak and Kishon Sing stand charged with sedition, came up before Mr. Harrison, Special Magistrate, again on the 7th instant, and was decided that a separate trial is necessary in the case of each accused. ## ALLEGED SEDITION IN C. P.

Mr. Shambhura Gadgil's appeal case in connection with his ridiculing the birthday honours taken up by the Judicial Commissioner on the 7th. Barristers Dick and Pandit appeared for the Crown while the accused was defended by Mr. Dixit Bar-at-Law. Counsel for the defence in arguing the case showed how the sanction for prosecuting Mr. Gadgil was insufficient and that the articles were not seditious and did not come under section 124A, as the Chief Commissioner's status was not brought into content. The Amrita Bazar Patrika's views regarding the Government established by law were also put forth by him. Mr. Dixit urged that the articles were not seditious because they hinted at the Government conferring those titles in order that the titleholders might not bring drawback of the Government to its notice. The case closed to day and judgement was reserved.

BENGALI ARRESTED ON SUSPICION.

A young Bengali named Purna Chandra Pokro native of Chundernagore, was arrested at Madras on the 7th by the police. He is said to be an associate of Hoti Lal Burma, now undergoing imprisonment at Agra. The accused with Hoti Lal started an Association in Pondichery with the object of carrying on an Anti-British agitation. Mr Pappa Row Naidu, the officer who arrested the accused at the station was led to do so by a photograph which fell into his hands accidentally and which showed the accused with others a group surrounded by dangerous weapons. The accused was produced before the Commissioner of Police and not being able to give a satisfactory account for his presence in Madras was remanded to jail.

HALUDBARI DACOITY.

Quite a fuss was made at Nattore in connection with the Haludbari dacoity on Tuesday morning, the 30th November, when some of the most respectable gentlemen's houses were searched by the District Superintendent of Police, Rajshahi, the P. A. of the Inspector General, C. I. D. Dacca, with several of their enthusiastic Mahomedan Sub-Inspectors and other followers. The peace-loving and quiet Nattore people were very much offended and surprised at this unusual, unnecessary and vexatious procedure of the police, at a place which had firmly fixed its reputation of being cold and dormant during the last few years regarding all sorts of Swadeshi agitation.

Five houses belonging to Dr. Romesh Chandra Sunkar, Dr. Hari Mohan Ghose, Babu Haro Gobind Sunkar, Kaviraj Jogendra Nath Roy and Mathur Karmakar were raided and very closely inspected. The last house is a shop of the said Karmakar who being absent on the occasion and his shop being closed, the police broke open the doors, and after examining all the boxes, took away an iron safe to the police "Malkhana," for inspection as the safe couldn't be opened easily.

As is the case almost everywhere, the attempts were all fruitless and nothing incriminating or in any way connected with the Haludbari dacoity could be found out from the searched houses. The only things that the police took possession of were (1) a copy of the Gita and (2) a few pieces of sample clothes of the Ludhiana Mills from Hari Mohan Babu's house, (3) an old goat cutting "kukri" and (4) two rusty spear heads from Haro Gobind Babu's house, (5) a stray letter, (6) and old telegram (7) a copy of "Deshi Katha" and (8) two photos of Mr. Pal and Md. Leakat Hossain from the Kaviraj's Dispensary.

AN EXPLANATION AND A MYSTERY

The "Sudhaya" of Lahore publishes a letter purporting to come from Sufi Amba Prasad from Persia in which he says that the object of Sufi Amba Prasad and Sardar Ajit Singh's leaving India was given some respite to the latter as he wanted some rest and the Police would not allow him peace anywhere in India. On reaching Persia, some one informed the British Consul at Bushire that both the Sufi and the Sardar had absconded from India and there was a warrant against them and that they wanted to establish a secret society in Persia. The Consul evidently believed the story and sent for the Sufi and the Sardar to get their names registered. On their going to him he wanted proofs of their identity. They were allowed a week's time for the purpose. On the fifth day however the British Consul again sent for them and advised them to be present on the 9th November threatening severe action in case of non-compliance. The writer adds that he and the Sardar thereupon smelt some foul play and stealthily left the place. If the letter is genuine it would appear that M. Ziaul-Haq, Editor of the defunct "Peshwa" who accompanied the Sufi and the Sardar and against whom there is also a charge of sedition is still at Bushire and has not been molested by the British Consul—Panjabee.

ANOTHER JOURNALIST PROSECUTED.

Ziaul Haq, Editor of the defunct "Peshwa" who had been arrested at Bushire on the 7th instant, under section 124A, was placed before the special Magistrate. It is said he will turn an approver and made a confession before the British Consul at Bushire, who has written a letter to the District Magistrate, Lahore, about his confession.

He was placed before the Special Magistrate and has been sent to the District Magistrate for trial.

THE CHALAI RIOT SEQUEL.

The trial of Swaminatha Sastri, Assistant Superintendent of Police, for alleged suppression of evidence and fabricating false evidence in the recent Chalai riot case was resumed last week.

Mr. B. Kesava Rao, the Health Officer was examined as a witness. It is said that the accused had written a letter to the contents of which were that the peon of Health Department had given a statement before the accused about his having seen certain acts done by some men who had been arrested in connection with the riot. In the letter written by the accused to the witness the former asked the latter to send the peon to the residence of the accused and receive instruction before he gave evidence in court. The accused had written to the witness asking him to give strict injunction to his peon not to turn hostile. The letter was produced and was filed.

The jailor, Krishna Rao of the Central Prison, deposed having detained the men arrested as rioters, in the prison also policeman including the accused, went into to the prison with witnesses to identify the rioters; but his opinion was that there was nothing improper in the procedure adopted by the Police.

Narayan Pillay, Subadar Major of the Nair Brigade, gave evidence, in course of which he said that some police constables went to him and told him that the accused wanted some Brigade Sepoys as witnesses. Narayana Pillay further deposed that the Sepoys were asked to be sent to the house of the accused to ascertain instructions before they were examined as witnesses.

Mr. Ittycheria, a High Court Vakil, who was defence counsel in the riot case was then examined and said that his information was that the accused had been procuring false evidence in the Chalai riot case in which the accused was the police officer who investigated it. Further questioned he said that the information was given by one of his clients or against. As such, he declined to name the individual who took protection under section 126 of the Evidence Act.

Among other witnesses examined were banker Krishniah who was an acquitted riot prisoner and M. K. Govinda Pillai, a High Court Vakil, who was a defence counsel in the riot case. These two witnesses said they had no knowledge or information about accused having had part in the fabrication of false evidence.

THE ENGLISH CRISIS.

Lord Curzon, speaking at Oldham defended the hereditary principle, which was instinct with national life. The Lords, he said, were above the dangers and temptations which beset popular judgment. The consent of two Chambers required before any revolutionary charge was effected. He was convinced that the Lords would refuse to play the ignominious and dangerous part expected.

Lord Ampthill, speaking at Kettering, was unable to complete his speech defending the Lords owing to incessant interruptions.

Lord Denbigh, speaking at Finsbury amidst uproar, said that he preferred to go down fighting than lie down and be jumped on.

HALUDBARI DACOITY. REPORTED CONFESSION BY ONE OF THE ACCUSED.

Sailendranath Dass, one of the accused in the Haludbari Bazar Dacoity case, is reported to have made a confession before a Sub-Deputy Magistrate of Kushtea on a conditional pardon having been granted to him.

The confession is to the effect that Sailendra agreed, on the suggestion of another of the accused, to take part in the dacoity. Both went to Sealdah to take the Darjeeling Mail to Damukda Station. They met four others whom the approver did not know by sight or name. The six went by the Darjeeling Mail to Damukda Station whence they proceeded to Haludbari Bazar. There they met five others who were armed with two rifles and four revolvers. Sailendra and Ganesh mounted guard at the door of the Marawari's house while the rest entered it. He could not say what happened inside the house. After an hour, the nine came out of house, five of them who were strangers to the approver, escaping with the booty and arms. The remaining six, among whom Sailendra was one, made for the Murpur Station, where they were arrested by the police on suspicion.

The case will be on camera before the Sub-Deputy Magistrate of Kushtea preliminary committal, to the Special Magistrate, on Monday next.

Sailendra, the accused, is alleged to have confessed to a munshi on cave.

IMPERIAL COUNCIL.

RESOLUTION.

Calcutta, the 15th November, 1909.

With the approval of the Secretary of State in Council the Governor-General in Council has to day brought into operation the Indian Councils Act, 1909, and has published the rules and regulations relating to the nomination and election of the members of the enlarged Legislative Councils. This act marks the completion of the earnest and prolonged deliberations that were initiated by the Viceroy more than three years ago, when he appointed a Committee of his Executive Council to consider and report on the general question of giving to the peoples of India a larger measure of political representation and wider opportunities of expressing their views on administrative matters.

2. The various stages of inquiry and discussion which followed need not be reviewed at length. In the Home Department letter of the 24th August 1907 the Government of India put forward certain provisional and tentative proposals, and invited the local Governments to submit their matured conclusions, after consulting important bodies and individuals representing the various classes of the community. The voluminous opinions elicited by that letter were fully dealt with in the despatch which the Government of India addressed to the Secretary of State on the 1st October 1908 and in Lord Morley's despatch of the 27th November following. Since those papers were published the Government of India have been engaged in communication with the Secretary of State in working out the principles accepted by him and the scheme finally adopted for the future constitution of the Legislative Councils is embodied in the Indian Councils Act and in the Regulations which are published to-day. The Governor-General in Council will now proceed to state briefly the extent and nature of the changes introduced and to indicate in what respects they differ from the proposals contained in the papers already published.

The seed and soul of STUDENT-LIFE: The true builder of the Nation.

BY

SJ. ROMESH CHANDRA CHAKRAVARTY.

THE THEOSOPHIST (conducted by COL. H. S. OLcott, P. T. S.), Madras:—"An excellent publication deserves to be in the hands of every Hindu student who neglects his religion."

THE GUJARATI PUNCH (Ahmedabad):—"In this book are collected the several rules laid down by the Rishis of old to be observed by every Brahmachari. No greater service is rendered to a country than the one which touches the formation of individual character in the youth of the country. Efforts in the direction of bringing up the posterity in a way that would elevate their mental position which would ultimately work up the way to bring back the country to its good old position are not less needed than Congresses and Conferences. The book should be in the hands of every student."

Notice of Removal.

The office of the Karmayogin has been removed from 14, Sham Bazar Street to 4, Shampookar Lane Calcutta.

FACTS AND OPINIONS.

The United Congress Negotiations.

The persistence of the Bengaler in shielding Moderate obstinacy under cover of an appeal to the wholly inconclusive proceedings of the private Conference in the Amrita Bazar Office last year shows both the paucity of possible arguments for the Moderate position and the readiness of its chief organ to ignore facts of which it has been reminded more than once and which it cannot deny. The difference between the conference last year and the recent negotiations is radical. That conference was between Conventionists and non-Conventionists, the recent negotiations were between Moderates and Nationalists. The Amrita Bazar Office Conference was an attempt made by certain leaders in Bengal and Maharashtra to secure admission for the Nationalists to the Convention. The United Congress Committee was confined to Bengal and set to consider whether Bengal Moderates and Nationalists could not agree together before inviting the Conventionists of other provinces to accept the terms offered by United Bengal. Last year's Conference was a confabulation of leading men representing their own opinions only, this year's negotiations were conducted by men elected for the purpose by the Provincial Conference representing the whole of Bengal. At the conference in Bagbazar it was the middle section of opinion, neither Moderate nor Nationalist, of which S. J. Motilal Ghose, Rai Jotindranath Chaudhuri, and some of the older leaders in the Mofussil are the most influential members, which engineered a compromise in the absence of the Nationalist leaders. S. J. Tilak was a prisoner in Mandalay jail, S. J. Aurobindo Ghose under trial at Alipur, S. J. Khaparde and S. J. Bipin Chandra Pal absent in England. The compromise was reluctantly accepted by many of the Nationalists present,—as we have ascertained by correspondence with some of the chief Nationalists who attended,—and only because it was pressed on them that these were the only terms on which the Moderate party would admit of the idea of union. It was not accepted at all by the Bengal Nationalists and it has been recently admitted by the Amrita Bazar Patrika that letters were received from the Mofussil repudiating the surrender on the question of the creed. How is it that the Bengaler persists in ignoring these facts? The compromise was rejected by the Moderates themselves, Bombay refusing utterly to recognize the four Calcutta resolutions as a possible part of any treaty, and this was recognized by the Moderates this year; for at the first meeting of the United Congress Committee it was distinctly intimated to the Nationalist members that the four resolutions must not be pressed as a condition of union. In other words, the one concession for which some of the leading Nationalists induced themselves to waive their rooted objections to constitution and creed, is expunged and the Nationalists are expected to be bound by a rejected compromise by which the Moderates refuse to be bound. They are expected to adhere to the concessions they made last year, while the only concession made to them is withdrawn. This fact is quite sufficient by itself to put the Bengaler's argument out of court. We repeat that the recent negotiations had nothing to do with last year's abortive compromise, rejected as it was by both parties immediately after it was made. Their sole object was to ascertain whether the Moderates would accept substantial concessions from the Nationalists without asking the latter to sacrifice their conscience and their principles. Apparently they are not. Therefore union is impossible.

A New Sophism.

Another and very singular argument is advanced by the Bengalees which evinces a similar disregard of facts and of the real significance of facts. It is alleged that both sides in Bengal are agreed as to the four resolutions, that the creed is part of the four resolutions, that the creed was accepted by the Nationalists at Pabna and therefore they ought not to object to sign it as a condition of entering the Congress. In the first place, if the four resolutions are to be so binding on the Nationalists that they must be ready to sign one of them at the call of the Moderates, then they must be made equally binding on the Moderates and we call on them to sign a declaration of acceptance of the Boycott as a condition of entry into an United Congress. Just as the Moderates from Bombay accepted the Boycott resolution at Calcutta in deference to the weight of public opinion, so we accepted the Colonial self-government resolution as the opinion of the majority and are no more bound to subscribe to it personally than Sir. Pherozshah Mehta is bound to subscribe to the Boycott. The four resolutions merely framed a compromise between the two political schools, not a declaration of Nationalist faith. As for Bengal, it is well known that the whole of Bengal does not accept Colonial self-Government as the ultimate goal of political aspiration. At Pabna it was only to avoid a discussion dangerous to unity that the Nationalists contented themselves in spite of the majority they had, with placing their dissent on record through the mouth of S. J. Manoranjan Guha. The Bengalees cannot have forgotten that incident. It was revived again at Hughly when the Moderates insisted on whittling down the Boycott to a mere commercial measure as a price of their adherence to the Conference and S. J. Aurobindo Ghose desired to bring forward an amendment, which he would subsequently withdraw, in order to mark that the Nationalists did not accept the resolution as the opinion of the country. The Moderate leaders threatened to withdraw if this was done and S. J. Aurobindo Ghose was requested to confine himself to the precedent established by S. J. Manoranjan Guha at Pabna. He then distinctly expressed his doubt whether this would be sufficient to make the Nationalist attitude clear to the country and the advantage taken of our complaisance by the Bengalees to misrepresent the Nationalist attitude at Pabna shows that his apprehensions were perfectly justified. If this is the light in which the Moderates choose to put the Nationalist willingness to compromise, it may be necessary at the next Conference for our party not only to move an amendment but to put it to the vote regardless of Moderate threats of secession.

Futile Espionage.

We wonder whether it is really impossible to maintain a great Empire without demoralising oneself and the country by means of an unworthy system of espionage? Since the initiation of the Swadeshi movement the army of spies and informers have grown as plentiful as insects round a bright light. Formerly men of some distinction had the honour of being watched in their houses, dogged in their goings, honoured by the private inspection of their correspondence. But nowadays it is enough to be suspected of patriotism to have the inefficient hirelings of the Police, if not the worthy guardians of the Law themselves, sticking like burs to one's heels. Is anything gained by these excessive and no doubt costly precautions? If we are to judge by the sorry specimens who have besieged us for the last six months, a more incapable creature than the ordinary Indian spy does not exist. He has an engaging simplicity of artifice which at once betrays his savoury vocation, and if he does not carry "spy" written legibly on his forehead, as a multitude of them do, he is so transparent in his methods that he might just as well be labelled, "Due at Royd Street." Nor do we quite see what is gained by watching a man's house or his office with an open brazenness. The office of the Dharma has recently been favoured with the loitering of watchers who spend their days gazing lovingly at the building and making affectionate and importunate enquiries as to the movements and habits of the editor. This open lovemaking strikes us as a little indecent; it would be better done behind a veil. And what do the authorities hope to gain by these unique researches? Do they hope to see either bombs or packets of sedition being carried into the building? Or is a leader of public agitation likely to convert his newspaper office or his house into an open resort of secret conspirators? Even a bureaucracy ought to credit its political opponents with some little common sense, even if they cannot credit them with honesty of motive and frankness of action.

Convention Voyagers.

We understand that some seven or eight faithful hearts are meditating the journey to Lahore to assist Mr. Madan Mohan Malaviya in carrying out Sir Pherozshah's orders. We wish them a good voyage and a speedy repentance. One wonders, by the way, where the delegates of the Convention are going to start up from at the last moment. We watch in vain for the news of numerous elections all over the country. Secret conclaves, rushed up quarrels, sittings with silent visitors, and, finally, secret elections seem to be the best features of convention politics. Or are the delegates ashamed of publishing their names?

CREED AND CONSTITUTION.

The attempt to bring about the unity of the two parties in Bengal as a preliminary to the holding of an United Congress has split on the twin rocks of creed and constitution. We will place before the country as succinctly as possible the issues which were posited during the negotiations and state clearly the Nationalist attitude, leaving it to Bengal to judge between us and the upholders of the Convention's creed and constitution. We ask our countrymen to consider whether the concessions we made were not large and substantial and the single concession offered to us worthless and nugatory, whether the reservations we made were not justifiable and necessary, except on the view that principles are of no value in politics, and, if they come to the conclusion that the proposals we made were fair and moderate, we ask them to absolve us of all responsibility for the failure of the negotiations.

The terms offered by the Moderate party were based on a compromise framed at the Amrita Bazar Office last year which has since been rejected by the Moderates in one of its most important features, namely, the insistence on the acceptance of the four Calcutta resolutions as an indispensable condition of union. The Moderate proposal was that the Nationalists should sign the creed unconditionally and accept the Conventionist constitution, but that the Bombay leaders should be asked to consent to the formation of a Committee this year at Lahore to revise the Constitution and pass it as revised at the next session. The terms of the revision would naturally be left to that Committee and if it were equally composed of Nationalists and Moderates, there would have been some value in the concession. But by a rule of the Moderate constitution all Associations not of three years' standing would be debarred from sending delegates. The formation of the Nationalists into a distinct party was only completed in the year 1906, that is precisely three years ago, and the rule was evidently framed in order to help in making impossible the election of Nationalist delegates. At the time the rule was framed there was not and could not be any association of our party with the requisite qualification, and such bodies as would have been qualified now, have mostly perished in the storm of repression which broke on the Nationalists after the unnatural alliance between coercive conciliation and an Indian progressive party previous to the Surat Congress,—an alliance not then declared, but sufficiently proved by the conduct and utterances of Sir Pheroz-shah Mehta and Mr Gokhale then and after. It is evident, therefore, that if we accepted the Moderate constitution apart from its utter illegality, we should be consenting to our own exclusion by an electoral device worthy of Lord Morley himself, even though the front door might be nominally open to us. Only an insignificant number of Nationalists would be able to qualify as delegates and the Revision Committee would be a Moderate Committee and the revision a mere modification of unessential details. The concession therefore was nugatory, as illusory as the Reforms offered to us by bureaucratic benignity. On the other hand, the Nationalists were expected to sign a creed which they could not uphold as their own conscientious belief, to recognize an unconstitutional constitution and to leave the four resolutions to the chances of a Moderate Subjects Committee and the possible prohibition of their amendments by a Mehta or a Malaviya.

The Nationalist members of the Committee rejected these impossible demands and submitted proposals of their own on each of the three main points at issue. They consented to accept the first Article of the Moderate Constitution which declared the objects of the Congress to be selfgovernment and the acquisition of the rights of British citizenship: they refused to accept the second Article which requires every representative elected by the people to subscribe personally to these objects as a precondition of entering the pandal as a delegate. They refused to accept the Constitution as a Constitution, but they consented to accept it as a set of provisional rules allowed by mutual agreement to govern Congress proceedings until a real Constitution was passed next year, provided that the rule limiting the right of election to Associations of three years standing which accepted the creed, should be made inoperative by the same mutual agreement. They agreed not to press the four resolutions as a precondition of union, provided they received an assurance that they should not be debarred from bringing them in the Subjects Committee and, if necessary, in the Congress itself. The Moderates rejected the proposal; they demanded unconditional acceptance and subscription to the creed as the indispensable basis of union. Yet the Nationalists had readily conceded everything which the other party could reasonably expect. They accepted a limited selfgovernment as the object of the Congress, although they refused to accept it as their own, they accepted the Moderate constitution with the exception of one subclause which meant the exclusion of Nationalist delegates; and made no further stipulation that it should be changed in any way previous to being passed as the real legal Constitution of the Congress; they consented to leave over the question of the four resolutions, reserving only their constitutional right to move them in Subjects Committee and in Congress. We ask, could anything have been fairer, more generous, more thoroughly pervaded by the desire to bring about unity even at the cost of substantial, indeed immense concessions?

Our attitude with regard to the creed has been consistent throughout. We accepted the Colonial self-government resolution at Calcutta in 1906 because we saw that it was the opinion of the majority. We accepted it at Pabna and Hughly because it was the opinion of an influential minority whom we did not wish to alienate. If we had been asked to subscribe to it as a creed or even as the objects of the Congress in 1906, we should have at once and emphatically refused. At Pabna the Moderates did not venture to demand any such subscription from the delegates, they did not ask it at Hughly. They knew very well that the demand would have been indignantly repudiated by Bengal. We now go further and consent to accept it as the objects of the Congress, to be only altered when all India wishes to alter it, for that is the provision in the Moderate constitution. We propose to accept it and adhere to in the same spirit, either as the opinion of the majority or as a necessary concession to secure the adhesion of an influential minority. It is a political accommodation, nothing else. To consent to Article II, which is a clause of exclusion limiting popular election, is a very different matter. The Moderate argument was that it is not a creed we are asked to sign, but merely a declaration of acceptance of the objects of the Congress and that it need not in any way limit or modify our speech and action except for the few hours spent in the Congress pandal. Apart from the very doubtful political honesty of such a distinction, we do not believe that it is the view of the creed held in other parts of India and in practice it could not work. The District Associations and the political Associations electing delegates to the Congress are expected by the Moderate Constitution to subscribe to the Congress creed or statement of objects and, if they utter or allow their prominent members to utter sentiments or pass resolution inconsistent with it, the Congress would have a right to feel embarrassed and stigmatize the departure as double dealing. This is the reason why we have always opposed the limitation of the aims or beliefs of the Congress by any hard and fast rule. We would oppose it even if the creed were a declaration of the Nationalist faith. Such a limitation deprives the Congress of its free and representative character, it hampers aspiration and public opinion, it puts a premium on political hypocrisy. Even if we allow the argument of the Bengal Moderates, our fundamental objection to Article II is not removed. It is an exclusory clause, it limits the right of the people to elect any representative they choose, it sets up an authority over the electorate in the same way as the exclusory clauses of the Government Reform Councils Regulations, it is a sort of Congress Test Act arbitrary and undemocratic. The true democratic principle is that the man elected by the people must be recognized as a delegate, whatever his opinions. We shall always oppose any restriction of the freedom of election by the Government, how can we consistently do so, if we recognize a restriction in a popular assembly of our own making? And if this principle of exclusion is once admitted, where is it to stop? What guarantees us against the future introduction of a new clause demanding the signing of a declaration renouncing Boycott and passive resistance as a precondition of entrance into the Pandit?

It will be seen therefore that from whatever point of view it is taken, the refusal to accept Article II. of the Convention rules was not only reasonable, but the Nationalists could not have taken any other course without committing political and moral suicide. The reasonableness of our position on the two other points is self-evident and need not be argued. The refusal of these liberal concessions even by the Bengal Moderates shows that the holding of an united Congress is impossible. The argument that the Convention cannot accept such terms, only shows that the Convention can never be the basis of a united Congress and, that while it exists, an united Congress is out of the question. Before, therefore, any farther steps can be taken in that direction, we must await the collapse of the Convention which we believe to be not far distant. The Nationalist party have stated the terms on which alone they will consent to a compromise, and they will not lower them, neither will they renew negotiations until either the Convention is dead and buried or the Moderate leaders give up their attachment to the Convention creed and constitution.

TO MY COUNTRYMEN.

Two decisive incidents have happened which make it compulsory on the Nationalist party to abandon their attitude of reserve and expectancy and once more assume their legitimate place in the struggle for Indian liberties. The Reforms, so long trumpeted as the beginning of a new era of constitutional progress in India, have been thoroughly revealed to the public intelligence by the publication of the Councils Regulations and the results of the elections showing the inevitable nature and composition of the new Councils. The negotiations for the union of Moderates and Nationalists in an United Congress have failed owing to the insistence of the former on the Nationalists subscribing to a Moderate profession of faith.

The survival of Moderate politics in India depended on two factors, the genuineness and success of the promised Reforms and the use made by the Conventionists of the opportunity given them by the practical suppression of Nationalist public activity. The field was clear for them to establish the effectiveness of the Moderate policy and the living force of the Moderate party. Had the Reforms been a genuine initiation of constitutional progress, the Moderate tactics might have received some justification from events. Or had the Moderates given proof of the power of carrying on a robust and vigorous agitation for popular rights, their strength and vitality as a political force might have been established, even if their effectiveness had been disproved. The Reforms have shown that nothing can be expected from persistence in Moderate politics except retrogression, disappointment and humiliation. The experience of the last year has shown that, without the Nationalists at their back, the Moderates are impotent for opposition and robust agitation. The political life of India in their hands has languished and fallen silent.

By the incontrovertible logic of events it has appeared that the success and vigour of the great movement inaugurated in 1905 was due to the union of Moderate and Nationalist on the platform of selfhelp and passive resistance. It was in order to provide an opportunity for the reestablishment of this union, broken at Surat, that the Nationalists gathered in force at Hughly in order to secure some basis and means of negotiation which might lead to united effort. The hand which we held out, has been rejected. The policy of Lord Morley has been to rally the Moderates and coerce the Nationalists; the policy of the Moderate party led by Mr. Gokhale and Sir Pherozshah Mehta has been to play into the hands of that policy and give it free course and a chance of success. This alliance has failed of its object; the beggarly reward the Moderates have received, has been confined to the smallest and least popular elements in their party. But the rejection of the alliance with their own countrymen by the insistence on creed and constitution shows that the Moderates mean to persist in their course even when all motive and political justification for it have disappeared. Discomfited and humiliated by the Government, they can still find no way to retrieve their position nor any clear and rational course to suggest to the Indian people whom they misled into a misunderstanding of the very limited promises held out by Lord Morley.

Separated from the great volume of Nationalist feeling in the country, wilfully shutting its doors to popularity and strength by the formation of electorates as close and limited as those of the Reformed Councils, self-doomed to persistence in a policy which has led to signal disaster, the

Bool Bool Soaps are unrivalled in the market.

Convention is destined to perish of inanition and popular indifference, dislike and opposition. If the Nationalists stand back any longer, either the national movement will disappear or the void created will be filled by a sinister and violent activity. Neither result can be tolerated by men desirous of their country's development and freedom.

The period of waiting is over. We have two things made clear to us, first, that the future of the nation is in our hands, and, secondly, that from the Moderate party we can expect no cordial co-operation in building it. Whatever we do, we must do ourselves, in our own strength and courage. Let us then take up the work God has given us, like courageous, steadfast and patriotic men willing to sacrifice greatly and venture greatly because the mission also is great. If there are any unnerved by the fear of repression, let them stand aside. If there are any who think that by flattering Anglo-India or coquetting with English Liberalism they can dispense with the need of effort and the inevitability of peril, let them stand aside. If there are any who are ready to be satisfied with mean gains or unsubstantial concessions, let them stand aside. But all who deserve the name of Nationalists, must now come forward and take up their burden.

The fear of the law is for those who break the law. Our aims are great and honourable, free from stain or reproach, our methods are peaceful, though resolute and strenuous. We shall not break the law and, therefore, we need not fear the law. But if a corrupt police, unscrupulous officials or a partial judiciary make use of the honourable publicity of our political methods to harass the men who stand in front by illegal ukases, suborned and perjured evidence or unjust decisions, shall we shrink from the toll that we have to pay on our march to freedom? Shall we cower behind a petty secrecy or a dishonourable inactivity? We must have our associations, our organisations, our means of propaganda, and, if these are suppressed by arbitrary proclamations, we shall have done our duty by our motherland and not on us will rest any responsibility for the madness which crushes down open and lawful political activity in order to give a desperate and sullen nation into the hands of these fiercely enthusiastic and unscrupulous forces that have arisen among us inside and outside India. So long as any loophole is left for peaceful effort, we will not renounce the struggle. If the conditions are made difficult and almost impossible, can they be worse than those our countrymen have to contend against in the Transvaal? Or shall we, the flower of Indian culture and education, show less capacity and self-devotion than the coolies and shopkeepers who are there rejoicing to suffer for the honour of their nation and the welfare of their community?

What is it for which we strive? The perfect self-fulfilment of India and the independence which is the condition of self-fulfilment are our ultimate goal. In the meanwhile such imperfect self-development and such incomplete self-government as are possible in less favourable circumstances, must be attained as a preliminary to the more distant realisation. What we seek is to evolve self-government either through our own institutions or through those provided for us by the law of the land. No such evolution is possible by the latter means without some measure of administrative control. We demand, therefore, not the monstrous and misbegotten scheme which has just been brought into being, but a measure of reform based upon those democratic principles which are ignored in Lord Morley's Reforms,—a literate electorate without distinction of creed, nationality or caste, freedom of election unhampered by exclusory clauses, an effective voice in legislation and finance and some check upon an arbitrary executive. We demand also the gradual devolution of executive government out of the hands of the bureaucracy into those of the people. Until these demands are granted, we shall use the pressure of that refusal of co-operation which is termed passive resistance. We shall exercise that pressure within the limits allowed us by the law, but apart from that limitation the extent to which we shall use it, depends on expediency and the amount of resistance we have to overcome.

On our own side we have great and pressing problems to solve. National education languishes for want of moral stimulus, financial support, and emancipated brains keen and bold enough to grapple with the difficulties that hamper its organisation and progress. The movement of arbitration, successful in its inception, has been dropped as a result of repression. The Swadeshi-Boycott movement still moves by its own impetus, but its forward march has no longer the rapidity and organised irresistibility of forceful purpose which once swept it forward. Social problems are pressing upon us which we can no longer ignore. We must take up the organisation of knowledge in our country, neglected throughout the last century. We must free our social and economic development from the incubus of the litigious resort to the ruinously expensive British Courts. We must once more seek to push forward the movement toward economic self-sufficiency, industrial independence.

These are the objects for which we have to organize the national strength of India. On us falls the burden, in us alone there is the moral ardour, faith and readiness for sacrifice which can attempt and go far to accomplish the task. But the first requisite is the organization of the Nationalist party. I invite that party in all the great centres of the country to take up the work and assist the leaders who will shortly meet to consider steps for the initiation of Nationalist activity. It is desirable to establish a Nationalist Council and hold a meeting of the body in March or April of the next year. It is necessary also to establish Nationalist Associations throughout the country. When we have done this, we shall be able to formulate our programme and assume our proper place in the political life of India.

THE NATIONAL VALUE OF ART.

VI

— 000 —

The enormous value of Art to human evolution has been made sufficiently apparent from the analysis incomplete in itself, which we have attempted. We have also incidentally pointed out its value as a factor in education. It is obvious that no nation can afford to neglect an element of such high importance in the culture of its people or the training of some of the higher intellectual, moral and aesthetic faculties in the young. The system of education which, instead of keeping artistic training apart as a privilege for a few specialists, frankly introduces it as a part of culture no less necessary than literature or science, will have taken a great step forward in the perfection of national education and the general diffusion of a broad-based human culture. It is not necessary that every man should be an artist. It is necessary that every man should have his artistic faculty developed, his taste trained, his sense of beauty and insight into form and colour and that which is expressed in form and colour, made habitually active, correct and sensitive. It is necessary that those who create, whether in great things or small, whether in the unusual masterpieces of art and genius or in the small common things of use that surround a man's daily life, should be habituated to produce and the nation habituated to expect the beautiful in preference to the ugly, the noble in preference to the vulgar, the fine in preference to the crude, the harmonious in preference to the gaudy. A nation surrounded daily by the beautiful, noble, fine and harmonious becomes that which it is habituated to contemplate and realises the fullness of the expanding Spirit in itself.

In the system of National education inaugurated in Bengal, a beginning has been made by the importance attached to drawing and clay-modelling as elements of manual training. But the absence of an artistic ideal, the misconception of the true aim of manual training, the imperative financial needs of these struggling institutions making for a predominant commercial aim in the education given, the mastery of English ideas, English methods and English predilections in this so-called national education have rendered nugatory the initial advantage. The students have faculty, but the teaching given them wastes and misuses the faculty. The nation and the individual gain nothing by turning out figures in clay which faithfully copy the vulgarity and ugliness of English commercial production or by multiplying mere copies of men or things. A free and active imaging of form and hue within oneself, a free and self-trained hand reproducing with instinctive success not the form and measurement of things seen outside, for that is a smaller capacity easily mastered, but the inward vision of the relation and truth of things, an eye quick to note and distinguish, sensitive to design and to harmony in colour, these are the faculties that have to be evoked, and the formal and mechanical English method is useless for this purpose.

In India the revival of a truly national Art is already an accomplished fact and the masterpieces of the school can already challenge comparison with the best work of other countries. Under such circumstances it is unpardonable that the crude formal teaching of English schools and the vulgar commercial aims and methods of the West should subsist in our midst. The country has yet to evolve a system of education which shall be really national. The taint of Occidental ideals and alien and unsuitable methods has to be purged out of our minds, and nowhere more than in the teaching which should be the foundation of intellectual and aesthetic renovation. The spirit of old Indian Art must be recovered, the inspiration and directness of vision which even now subsists among the possessors of the ancient traditions, the inborn skill and taste of the race, the dexterity of the Indian hand and the intuitive gaze of the Indian eye must be recovered and the whole nation lifted again to the high level of the ancient culture—and higher.

SUKKUR SEDITION CASE.

The alleged sedition case against Virumal, Chetumal and Goverdhanlal was proceeded with at the Sessions Court, Sukkur, before Mr. Boyd, Sessions Judge, on the 14th. The prosecution is conducted by Mr. Lalchand Churhermal, M. A., Public Prosecutor, Sind, assisted by the Public Prosecutor, Sukkur. The accused are represented by four pleaders. The case has excited so much interest that though the morning was intensely cold, the Court House was so crowded that many were obliged to keep standing. The first day was occupied in the examination and cross-examination mainly of the Assistant Superintendent of Police. Yesterday the three sub-inspectors, who conducted the search in the houses of the accused persons, and Sudhu Sing, daftardar to the Collector of Sukkur, were examined. The cross-examination of the last witness was not finished when the case was postponed till the 17th.

TURPENTINE.

FAVOURITISM.

In its issue of the 17th November Truth brings to light the appointment recently made by the Government of Bengal as Assistant Superintendent of Police of "a gentleman formerly a planter, who some seven years ago was admitted to the provincial executive service as a Deputy Magistrate." In the latter capacity we are told he was employed as a Settlement Officer, with an extra allowance, but it is asserted that he never succeeded in passing the departmental examinations, and his transfer to a better post in the police is "naturally ascribed to favouritism."

"It is certainly difficult" remarks Truth "to account in any other way for an appointment which is, in any event, rank injustice to police officers awaiting promotion, to say nothing of fully qualified deputy magistrates."

NASIK MAGISTRATE SHOT.

Information was received in Bombay on the 22nd that Mr. M. T. Jackson, Sessions Judge of Nasik, was shot dead by an Indian at a "Pansupari" party.

Mr. Jackson was shot with a revolver by a Brahmin assassin. He had been invited by the inhabitants of Nasik, among whom he was popular, to a farewell entertainment in view of his approaching departure to take up his new duties in Bombay. A large and crowded gathering had assembled to do him honour. The proceedings were about to close and the Collector was leaving for the theatre with his Indian friends and was taking leave of his guests and about to depart when a man taking advantage of his movements shot him with a revolver. The assassin is said to be a young Brahmin but this lacks confirmation.

Last night the crowded town of Nasik was thrown into a state of great excitement owing to the rumour which spread like wildfire that the Collector had been assassinated.

Later on it transpired that the Collector had been invited by the inhabitants of Nasik among whom he was generally very popular for a farewell entertainment in view of his approaching departure to take up his new duties in Bombay and a large and crowded gathering had assembled to do honour to the departing Collector on the occasion.

From what can be gathered it is known that when the proceedings were about to be closed and the Collector was taking his leave and about to depart the assassin shot him with a revolver. The assassin whose name did not transpire is said to be a young Brahmin from Mahmud.

Another version is that Mr. Jackson Collector, and Assistant Collector prior to going to the Indian theatre of the city dined with Mr. and Mrs. Van Someren and subsequently accompanied Miss Van Someren and Miss Bean, the daughter and niece, respectively, of the Postmaster-General at the theatre.

As Mr. Jackson stepped into the theatre the assassin who was apparently in hiding stepped forward and aimed a revolver and shot at Mr. Jackson which missed him. But before he could be intercepted the assassin fired once again and on this occasion shot Mr. Jackson through the heart. Immediately the assassin was arrested by a crowd of people in the theatre.

THE HALUDBARI DACOITY.

The Circuit House where the case was heard was guarded as before by the Gurkha Military Police.

Babu Nirode Chandra Chatterji, vakil, on behalf of the Crown, produced some witnesses whose statements were recorded "in camera."

In connection with the case, it is reported that Khan Bahadur Shamsul Alum, Deputy Superintendent of Police C. I. D., Bengal, with Inspector Nishikanto Banerji of the local police on the 16th instant made a thorough search of the house of Bidhu Bhushan Biswas, one of the accused in recovering the major portion of the ornaments and cash alleged to have been looted. The search is alleged to have been conducted in consequence of the statement of Jitendra Nath Chuckerburtty, who was arrested but discharged along with three others, on Tuesday, the 14th instant. The property recovered is stated to have been dug out of a portion of the yard of the house where it was concealed. Jitendra, it is said, will be examined as a witness in the case. The ornaments are reported to have been identified by witnesses.

It is also stated that the conditional pardon granted to Sailendra Nath Dass, who had made a confession, has been withdrawn, and he will not be made an approver in the case.

Five of the eleven accused in the Haludbari case are residents of villages adjoining Haludbari Bazar where the dacoity was committed. The five men who were wounded with buckshot from revolvers have been discharged from hospital.

MR. KELKAR'S DISQUALIFICATION.

In reply to Mr. Kelkar's letter to Government requesting a reconsideration of the orders declaring him ineligible for election in the Legislative Council, the Government stated that its decision was made after a careful consideration of the question. His Excellency in Council regretted his inability to withdraw the same.

The following is the full text of the representation which Mr. N. C. Kelkar submitted to the Government of Bombay, requesting a re-consideration of its orders:—

To The Secretary to the Government, Legislative Department, Bombay.

Sir, - I beg to acknowledge receipt of a copy of a Government Notification dated 3rd instant, relating to my candidature at the election to the Bombay Legislative Council by the Local Boards in the Presidency, and forwarded to me by the Commissioner, C. D., with his Office No. R 5349 D-4-12-09. I actually received this copy, however, yesterday morning after my return from the moffussil where I had been in connection with my election; and I now hasten to submit the present representation in the hope that His Excellency in Council will be pleased to issue the necessary orders accordingly.

The notification in question, declaring me ineligible to be a candidate at Council elections, deprives me of a privilege, conceded under the new Councils Act, to every citizen to seek election to the Legislative Council by popular suffrage, and that too in exercise of a discretionary power manifestly intended as a reserve to be used on only extraordinary occasions, but even then not without public justification.

The notification was issued nearly two weeks after the Collector of Poona and the Commissioner, C. D., had received personal intimation from myself about my intended candidature, one week after the submission of my nomination as a candidate to the Collectors of Nasik and East Khandesh, two days after the acceptance, by the Commissioner, Central Division, of my nomination on formal scrutiny and the despatch of voting papers to the delegates elected by the Local Boards, one day after my name as a candidate was announced in the Bombay Government Gazette, and lastly when actual voting may be presumed to have commenced.

I humbly protest against the entire procedure as extremely unfair alike to myself and to the Local Board's electorate.

I respectfully ask for an opportunity for explanation, should His Excellency in Council deem such explanation necessary and for meeting the allegations held to constitute justificatory grounds for my disqualification maintaining that there is absolutely nothing in my past record to lead Government to consider my presence in the Legislative Council in public interest.

In conclusion, I beg to say that under these circumstances His Excellency in Council will be pleased to reconsider his decision and to the Local Boards to be proceeded with de novo.

TRIAL OF SWAMINATHA SASTRI.

Regarding the trial of Swaminatha Sastri, particulars of which are already published in the case under the first count, namely, subordination, the evidence is pretty well advanced. Arguments on both sides are over.

Mr. Abraham, Crown Prosecutor, addressed the Court and said that the evidence of Kesava Rao was convincing regarding the suppression of evidence as also the motive of the accused. The letter written by the accused to Kesava Rao, asking the latter to send his subordinate to the accused, was most improper. In that letter the accused told Rao to see that his subordinate did not turn out hostile. It was said that the subordinate was to refresh his memory. This was most extraordinary, as it was the duty of the Court which has to examine him as witness to do so. The accused, as investigating police officer, should not have had anything to do with men cited as prosecution witnesses. Not satisfied with the writing of this most improper letter, he also arranged to meet Kesava Rao. For this meeting Kesava Rao fixed a public place where several gentlemen were assembled and the Sastri was non-plussed. They then met at the office of the Government Pleader one hour before Kesava Rao gave evidence before the Court. The conversation that took place Abraham observed, significant. Sastri told Rao that he must not produce the letter. In spite of this, the letter was produced and filed as an exhibit. These with the other circumstances were sufficiently indicate of the motive of the accused. It must be added here, between these two persons was, Mr. observed Mr. Abraham, that before becoming Assistant Superintendent of Police the accused was a law officer to the Government, for a considerable time, besides being a High Court Vakil. In the face of these facts it was for the Court to judge the motive of the accused, in all the improper steps he took to bring about a conviction of the man, arrested in connection with the riot. In reply, Mr. Ramier, the defence vakil, said that the whole case turned on the exact words used in the conversation between Sastri and Kesava Rao. These words are not known. In the absence of those words the opinion of Kesava Rao ought not to be taken, nor should it guide the Court in forming a conclusion. It is a fact that must form the data for the Court to go by. These facts have not come as evidence. The impression or opinion of Kesava Rao is no evidence. Further, the law requires that for an offence of subordination there must be a representation; it must not be misrepresentation. These elements have not been proved to exist. Hence the proper course was to discharge the accused.

THE CONGRESS.

DRAFT RESOLUTIONS.

The draft resolutions of the Indian National Congress for the coming session have now been published. They express appreciation for the Reform Scheme, but disappointment that the original clause 3 of the Indian Councils Act was not adopted (the one dealing with Executive Councils). They also protest against the regulations under the act as now drafted, complain that the educated classes are not given a legitimate share in the Councils, and say that the claims of the non-Moslem portion of the learned professions have been ignored; also that disqualifications and restrictions of an unnecessarily arbitrary and unnecessarily wide character have been imposed on candidates for election; and that the regulations lack a liberal and progressive spirit. The treatment of Indians in South Africa is then dealt with and the Government are urged to take further steps. The Partition of Bengal is protested against. Deportations are condemned. Enquiry into high food grain prices is advocated. Laws restricting the alienation of land are condemned and an enquiry thereon is asked for. Resolutions similar to those passed last year are also included dealing with:—(1) Higher careers for Indians in the Army. (2) On Swadeshi (3) Education. (4) Omnibus resolution, including Military Charges, Separation of Judicial and Executive, Repressive Measures and Land Tax. THE POSITION IN BENGAL.

The "Bengalee" in the course of an article on Saturday wrote:

The hopes of a united Congress, we fear, are not to be realized, at least this year. The fact is to be deeply regretted, for Bengal has set its heart upon a united Congress. We trust, however, that the matter will not be permitted to lie where it is, but that the negotiations will be resumed under more favourable conditions and the goal of a United Congress eventually reached. The country would naturally like to know the reasons of this failure. The All-India Conference of both parties had agreed to the absolute and unconditional subscription to what is popularly known as the creed, the first article in the Constitution. This article lays down that self-government within the Empire is the goal of Congress aspirations and constitutional agitation, the method for its attainment.

Objection was, however, taken now to the subscription to the creed by the representatives of the other party. They declined "to sign any personal declaration on the point as a condition of entry into the Congress." If so how could they enter the Congress as at present constituted, and how could there be a United Congress.

THE PRESIDENT ELECT.

BENGAL AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT.

The Calcutta Gazette publishes the following Government Resolution on the Report of the Department of Agriculture Bengal, for the year ending the 30th June 1909:—

ORGANIZATION.

The question of the organization of the Provincial Agricultural Service is still under consideration. The present staff of Provincial Officers consists of 4 assistants who are being trained for employment as teachers at the Provincial Agricultural College, 2 travelling inspectors, 7 superintendents or overseers in charge of agricultural stations, 6 inspectors of agriculture, 1 assistant mycologist and 1 assistant entomologist. Three students returned from America in 1907-08 after receiving agricultural training at the Cornell University, and were appointed as assistants in the department; and of the two who returned during 1908-09 one entered the department as a probationer.

AGRICULTURAL STATION.

Six agricultural stations at Dumraon, Bankipore, Sabour, Chinsura, Bardwan and Cuttack were at work during the year. Steps were taken to start two more stations at Kharagpur in Midnapore to represent the laterite area, and at Ranchi to represent the Chota Nagpur plateau; but the projects have been kept in abeyance for want of money. The experimental work at Fraserganj was stopped owing to the difficulty of supervision; and the two small jute seed farms maintained at Berhanpore and Purnea were closed as the work can be done equally well at the Chinsura and Bardwan stations.

SCIENTIFIC EXPERIMENTS.

The experimental cultivations of various kinds of crops including jute, cotton, flax, sugarcane, potato and rice was carried on at various places in the Province with diverse results. Experiments with jute conducted at the Bardwan station on the lines laid down by the Inspector-General of Agriculture were attended with successful results and proved conclusively that, with due care in cultivation and retting, the Bardwan cultivators could produce from the Narayanganj seed as good fibre as is to be found in Eastern Bengal. The cultivation in Behar by indigo planters has been discontinued.

The experiments with cotton had unsatisfactory results. The flax cultivation at Dhooria in Muzaffarpur was financially very successful. The Agricultural chemist conducted a series of experiments to test the sugar yielding proportion of the different varieties of sugarcane, but no definite conclusions have yet been reached.

SERICULTURE.

The work of the silk-rearing establishment made satisfactory progress during the year. The old silk committee, consisting of non-official members, was abolished and was replaced by a new one with four silk experts as members and the Director of Agriculture as president. Under the supervision of this new committee a mulberry farm with a central seed-rearing nursery was started at Berhampur. The 9 model nurseries belonging to the old silk committee have been brought under government management and 5 new ones are under construction, of which 3 are in Berhampur, 1 in Birblum and 1 in Midnapore. They are intended to supply healthy seed to the rearers of silkworms. The total value of the seed sold was Rs. 5,874. Experiments made with Japanese and Italian mulberry seed gave encouraging results.

AGRICULTURAL EDUCATION

Little advance was made during the year in the promotion of agricultural education in the province. Unexpected delay in the commencement of the Agricultural College buildings at Sabaur will prevent the opening of the classes before November 1910. Meanwhile, the agricultural classes at the Sibpur Engineering College have been abolished, but an attempt to secure some continuity in training has been made by the grant of scholarship at institutions in other provinces. The students attending the agricultural classes attached to the several zilla schools and the collegiate school at Cuttack generally took little real interest in their work, the only exception being at Gaya, where agricultural instruction has been made a part of the general routine. The deputation of more students to America to study agriculture was discontinued during the year, partly because the supply of such trained men was likely to exceed the immediate requirements of the department and also because it seemed doubtful whether training under American conditions was altogether suitable for this country.

Mr. A. C. Sen, retired District and Sessions Judge, who was trained at the Cirencester College in England, has kept up his interest in agriculture, has both held classes for cultivators and delivered popular lectures on the subject. Voluntary service to the cause of agriculture of this character are specially valuable, and deserve the fullest recognition from the community.

AGRICULTURAL ASSOCIATIONS, FAIRS AND EXHIBITIONS.

The great interest taken in the agricultural development of the province by many members of the Provincial, Divisional and District Agricultural Associations, and the services rendered by them to the Agricultural Department are a source of gratification to the Lieutenant-Governor, to whom the work of Mr. Saroda Charan Mitter late a Judge of the Calcutta High Court, Rai Lalit Mohan Singh, Rai Bahadur of Chakdighi, and Babu Purnendu Narayan Singh, Secretary Patna Association, has been specially reported. Mr. A. N. Moberly, I C, S. has done much in his capacity of Chairman of the Sambalpur District Association for the benefit of agriculture in that district.

The agricultural fairs and shows held during the year, of which a brief account is given in Appendix II to the report, received grants-in-aid from Government aggregating Rs. 6,522. They appear to be continuing to serve a very useful purpose.

IRRIGATION.

The well-boring operations which have been undertaken in this province on the recommendation of the Indian Irrigation Commission have made little progress during the year partly in consequence of the want of practical experience on the part of the superintendent and partly because of the difficulty of close supervision over his work. He will for the future conduct his experiments under the supervision of the Principle of the Agriculture College at Sabaur. A large number of artisan wells were bored during the year in Muzaffarpur by the District Board in connection with the scarcity of water that prevailed there and were to a considerable extent successful.

PUBLICATION OF AGRICULTURAL INFORMATION.

Besides the quarterly Journal of Agriculture which was started during the previous year, the department published and circulated leaflets and notes containing information in connection with agriculture. Large quantities of seeds of various crops, manures, and agricultural implements were issued from the government central seed store, which was removed during the year to the site of the Agricultural School Farm at Sibpur.

INDIGO RESEARCH.

The indigo research operations at Sirsah were continued with the aid of the Government subsidy of Rs. 50,000. For the next five years Government will contribute Rs. 32,500 a year on condition that the Bihar Planters' Association subscribe Rs. 10,000 annually to the cost of the research work. The Association have obtained for that period the services of Mr. C. J. Pongthell, who has resigned his post as Imperial Bacteriologist in the Pusa Agricultural College and Research Institute in order to carry out and complete his researches.

MR. N. C. KELKAR'S INELIGIBILITY.

A PROTEST MEETING AT POONA.

MR. G. K. GOKHALE PRESIDENT.

A largely attended meeting of the Deccan Sabha was held on Saturday the 11th instant at 6 P. M. in Phapka Wada to protest against the disqualification of Mr. N. C. Kelkar by the Bombay Government in the recent election by the District Boards of the Central Division. Hon'ble Mr. G. K. Gokhale presided and the following resolution was unanimously adopted:—

The Deccan Sabha begs leave to enter its respectful but emphatic protest against the disqualification of Mr. N. C. Kelkar under clause (i) of Regulation 4 for the nomination and election of Additional Members of the Bombay Legislative Council. In the opinion of the Sabha there is nothing in Mr. Kelkar's reputation or antecedents to justify this exercise by the Government of the exceptional powers conferred by the clause and the Sabha deems it its duty to represent to the Government the fact that the action taken against Mr. Kelkar has created a very painful impression which unless removed by an early reconsideration of the order in question is bound to impair the value of the scheme of reforms in the eyes of the public and to interfere seriously with its proper working in the future.

MR. GOKHALE'S SPEECH.

Mr. Gokhale, in opening the proceedings, said that it was with deep regret and from a sense of public duty that they were assembled there that evening. There was no doubt that the Reform Regulations had been received with deep disappointment throughout the country except among Mahomedan circles. It was not merely that a larger representation was given to the Mahomedans than could be justified on any fair or reasonable basis. The difference made in the treatment of the two communities in regard to the franchise and the qualifications for candidates was quite marked and was entirely unnecessary. While the merits of the scheme lay hidden away under a mass of detail and its defects and inequalities were glaring and lay on the surface. The most important part of the reform was the enlargement of the functions of the Councils. That was undoubtedly valuable and would largely answer their present requirements but the distribution of representation and the electoral machinery provided were seriously defective; and he was convinced that the Regulations would have to be revised in regard to both before the next elections come round. However it was just now the duty of all to make the best of what they had got as the Viceroy had urged them to do the other day at Madras. But the matter they had assembled that evening to consider was of such a nature that an immediate protest was necessary against what had been done. The Bombay Government had disqualified Mr. Kelkar under clause (i) of Regulation 4 which empowered Government to disqualify a person if, in its opinion that person was of such reputation or antecedents that his election would be contrary to the public interest. Now on the face of things this was an exceptional power intended for grave and exceptional cases only. All ordinary cases including those of gross moral delinquency in which case disqualification would be reasonable were provided for by clauses from (a) to (h). The power conferred by clause (i) was an additional power obviously intended as a reserve to meet cases of persons of known and irreconcilable hostility to the very existence of the British Government who could not yet be touched by any of the previous clauses. The very fact that even deported persons were not expressly disqualified by the Regulation shows how extreme the cases must be and how strong and clear the grounds of action before clause (i) could be put into operation. The speaker was of opinion the clause should be removed from the Regulation altogether. The Councils were so constituted that the presence in them of a person even irreconcilably hostile to the British rule could do no real harm; whereas the chances were that the person himself might be observed in his view by the responsibilities of his position.

But whatever might be thought of that all felt it to be their duty to enter their strongest protest against the application of that clause to a man like Mr. Kelkar. They all knew Mr. Kelkar well and speaking for himself, Mr. Gokhale said that he knew him very well. He had no hesitating in saying that there was nothing in his views or in his career which could in any way justify the strong action taken by the Government against him. Mr. Gokhale did not share Mr. Kelkar's views in some matters but that did not prevent him from entertaining a sincere regard for Mr. Kelkar who was a generous and fair-minded opponent with an honourable record of public work behind him during the five years that Mr. Gokhale was President of the Poona City Municipality. Mr. Kelkar was a member of that body and he deemed it his duty now to give a public testimony not only to the zeal and capacity with which Mr. Kelkar did his work, but also to the manner in which he approached all municipal questions from the standpoint of public good only. That such a man should be disqualified under clause (i) and that the action should be taken at a time when the one thought of every body should be how to work the reform scheme so as to remove as much as possible of the existing friction was what he confessed he failed altogether to understand. In his humble opinion the step taken by the Government was most ill-advised and unjust and was calculated to cast serious discredit on the new reforms in the eyes of the public. The impression produced was most painful and Mr. Gokhale sincerely trusted that the Government would see its way to reconsider the matter and remove that impression.

The Hon. Mr. Gokhale writing to the "Times of India" "re" its criticism justifying Government's action for disqualifying Mr. Kelkar says:—Even fair-minded and generous men have been known all over the world to commit errors of judgment under the stress of strong emotions or owing to a mistaken sense of loyalty to their chiefs. For Mr. Kelkar's conduct in the contempt Court case, the High Court sentenced him to fourteen days simple imprisonment and a fine of one thousand rupees. That the High Court did not take a very serious view of that conduct may be concluded from the fact that it did not cancel his "sanad" as a pleader.

Mr. Gokhale concludes:—"You say that action of Government will commend itself to all honest and straight thinking men, but I have discussed this matter with scores of my friends as honest and straight thinking as you can find any where, and I have not yet met one who does not deplore what Government have done. Perhaps your remark was intended to illustrate the use of what you have not hesitated to call "Cant and Humbug."

FACTS AND OPINIONS.

The Perishing Convention.

The Convention has met at Lahore and the fact that it could meet at all, has been hailed as a great triumph by the Anglo-Indian Press. But the success of this misbegotten body in avoiding immediate extinction has only served to show the marks of decay in every part of its being, and the loud chorus of eulogies streaming up from Anglo-India will not help to prolong its days. The miserable paucity of its numbers, the absence of great ovations to its leaders, the surroundings of stifling coldness, indifference and disapproval in the midst of which its orators perorated and resolved, have been too striking to be concealed. Even the Statesman, which is anxious to pass off this fiasco as a signal triumph for Moderatism and dwells on the enthusiasm and earnestness in the Bradlaugh Hall,—an enthusiasm and earnestness other reporters were unable to discover,—is obliged to admit the smallness of the circle to which these creditable feelings were confined. To this body calling itself the Indian National Congress how many delegates did the Indian nation send? The magnificent total of three hundred. From Bengal Sjs. Surendranath, Bhupendranath and A. Chaudhuri with less than half-a-dozen followers enriched Lahore with their presence; Madras could muster only twelve; the Central Provinces sent so few that the reporters are ashamed to mention the number. The United Provinces sent, according to the Amrita Bazar Patrika's Correspondent, about thirty; the Bombay number is not mentioned, but even the Statesman does not go beyond eighty; the rest came from the Punjab. Even the Anglo-Indian champion of Conventionism, estimating largely and on the basis of hopes and expectations, cannot raise the total to four hundred. The same paper takes refuge in the "huge concourse" of spectators, but, when it comes to actual facts, the huge concourse melts away into some hundreds of spectators, an estimate supported by the statement in the Bengalee that there were considerably more spectators than delegates. It is admitted that Bradlaugh Hall which cannot seat more than three thousand was far from being filled, the Statesman observing two wings of the Hall to be quite empty and other accounts reporting the Hall to be half empty. An allowance of some thousand spectators to watch the performances of the gallant three hundred in this Thermopylae of Moderatism, will be as liberal as the facts will allow. Could there be more damning evidence of the unpopularity of this pretentious body of well-to-do oligarchs electing themselves semi-secretly in close electorates of a handful of men and yet daring to call themselves the nation's Congress? The farce is almost over. The falsity of their pretensions has been shown up signally. The Convention will not dare again to meet in the Panjab; it will not come to Bengal; Nagpur, Amraoti and the Maharashtra are barred to it; and if the attendance from Madras is any sign, it will not be easy for it to command a following or an audience again in the Southern Presidency. What remains to Conventionism? Bombay city, Gujarat and the United Provinces are still open to them for a season. The abstention of a disgusted nation has passed sentence of death on this parody of the Indian National Congress.

The Convention President's Address.

The most remarkable feature of Pandit Madan Mohan Malaviya's address is not what he said, but what he omitted to say. If the accounts telegraphed can be trusted, he said nothing of the Government, nothing at all of the the Boycott, of course, the Convention has boycotted,— nothing about the Bengal deportees, only a few words about the Transvaal. The speech was really a speech about the Reforms and every other great question of Indian politics was ignored or neglected. The attitude of the Convention on the Reforms is marked by that open insincerity which is the hallmark of Moderate politics. The Convention resolution is made up of two parts, an ecstatic tribute of praise and gratitude to the two Lords Morley and Minto, for their earnest and "arduous" endeavours, (note the grotesque absurdity of the language,) in extending to the people of this country a "fairly liberal" measure of constitutional reform, and a detailed and damning indictment of the measure for restrictions and provisions which are "excessive and unfair," "unjust, invidious and humiliating," "arbitrary and unreasonable," and for the "general distrust" of the educated classes and the "ineffective and unreal" composition of the non-official majority. If there is any meaning in language, the second part of the resolution gives the lie direct to the first. The language used is far stronger than any the Karmayogin has ever permitted itself to employ in its condemnation of the Reforms and, if the condemnation is at all justified by facts, the Reforms are a reactionary and not a progressive piece of legislation. And yet who is the chief mouthpiece of the Convention and the most damaging critic of the Reforms? A gentleman who has set the seal of approval on Lord Morley's measure by entering the Council of his province as an elected member. Actions speak more strongly than words, and the Government of India care little for criticism in detail so long as they get acceptance of the whole. From the Viceroy down to the obscurest Anglo-Indian scribbler the appeal to the Moderates is to criticise details hereafter, if they choose, but to accept the Reforms, the perpetual division of the two Indian communities, the humiliation of the Hindus, the extrusion of the educated classes from their old leading position, the denial of the only true basis of self-government,—to let, as the Indian Daily News persuasively puts it, by-gones be by-gones. Anglo-India puts Moderatism on the back and says in effect. "What if we have kicked you downstairs? Can't you be a good fellow and sit quietly on the bottom step until we take it in our heads to pull you up a little further?" And Moderatism must comply if it wishes to be tolerated.

The Alleged Breach of Faith.

The Moderate critics are never tired of harping on the difference between Lord Morley's scheme and the Regulations and alleging or hinting that promises have been made to the ear which have been broken in the act. The Statesman very naturally resents the implied charge of breach of faith. We do not know what private hopes the Secretary of State may have held out to Mr. Gokhale or Sj. Surendranath Banerji, but, judging from Lord Morley's public utterances, we do not think the charge of a breach of faith can be for a moment sustained. He has never pretended that his reform was the granting of a democratic constitution or the first step towards Parliamentary self-government. On the contrary he distinctly stated that if he had thought his measure to be anything of the kind he would have immediately withdrawn it. All that he promised was a scheme by which Indian public opinion could be more liberally consulted, and there were from the beginning distinct indications that the Government would put its own meaning on the phrase and draw a distinction between Indian opinion and Indian educated opinion. If the Moderates chose to interpret this limited concession as the granting of a constitution and a new Magna Charta, neither Lord Morley nor Lord Minto are to blame for a deliberate and gratuitous self-deception and deception of the people. The complaint that the non-official majority is ineffective and unreal, means simply that it is not a popular majority. We do not think the Government ever promised a popular majority; they promised a non-official majority and they have given it. If the Moderates chose to believe that the Government would go out of its way to make the non-official majority a popular one, they have themselves to thank for this pitiful self-delusion, against which the Nationalists have been warning the country for some time past. The truth is that they have been utterly worsted in their diplomatic relations with British Liberalism and they are now trying to exculpate themselves before the public by throwing the blame on their allies. No English statesman can be condemned for trying to get the best of a diplomatic bargain of this kind; the loser must blame his own folly, not the good faith of the other party. Did not the Bengal Moderates recently propose a similar bargain to the Nationalists in the United Congress Committee's negotiations? And, if the Nationalists had been fools enough to agree, would they have been justified afterwards in quarrelling with the good faith of the Moderates merely because they themselves had chosen to enter the Convention on conditions which would have meant hopeless ineffectiveness in that body and political suicide outside? If infants in diplomacy choose to cherish an obstinate admiration for their own Machiavellian cleverness or mere bookmen who do not understand the A. B. C. of practical politics, elect to play the game with past masters of political statecraft, the result is a foregone conclusion. We have exposed over and over again the hollowness of the pretensions of this measure to figure as a great step forward in Indian administration or the beginning of a new progressive era in Indian politics, but we did not need the publication of the Regulations to open our eyes to this hollowness. Lord Morley's own statements, the nature of things and of humanity and the clauses of the Reform Bill itself were a sufficient guide to anyone with even an elementary knowledge of politics.

The Nasik Murder.

The tale of assassinations is evidently not at an end; and it is difficult to believe that they will be until a more normal condition of things has been restored. The sporadic and occasional character of these regrettable incidents is sufficient to prove that they are not the work of a widespread Terrorist organisation, but of individuals or small groups raw in organisation and irresolute in action. The Anglo-Indian superstition of a great Revolutionary organisation like the Russian Revolutionary Committee is a romantic delusion. The facts are entirely inconsistent with it.

What we see is that, where there is sporadic repression of a severe kind on the part of the authorities, there is sporadic retaliation on the part of a few youthful conspirators, perfectly random in its aim and objective. The Nasik murder is an act of terrorist reprisal for the dangerously severe sentence passed on the revolutionary versifier Savarkar. It is natural that there should have been many meetings in Maharashtra to denounce the assassination, but such denunciations do not carry us very far. They have no effect whatever on the minds of the men who are convinced that to slay and be slain is their duty to their country. The disease is one that can only be dealt with by removing its roots, not by denouncing its symptoms. The Anglo-Indian papers find the root in our criticism of Government action and policy and suggest the silencing of the Press as the best means of removing the root. If the Government believe in this antiquated diagnosis, they may certainly try the expedient suggested. Our idea is that it will only drive the roots deeper. We have ourselves, while strongly opposing and criticising the actions and policy of the bureaucracy, abstained from commenting on specific acts of repression, as we had no wish to inflame public feeling; but to silence Nationalism means to help Terrorism. Our view is that the only way to get rid of the disease is to disprove Mr. Gokhale's baneful teaching that violence is the only means of securing independence, to give the people hope in a peaceful and effective means of progress towards that ideal, which is now the openly or secretly cherished ideal of every Indian, and to that end to organize peaceful opposition and progress within the law. If the Government can retrace their steps and remove the ban from lawful passive resistance and self-help and the Nationalist party, while holding its ultimate political aim, will define its immediate objective within limits which a Radical Government can hereafter consider, we believe politics in India will assume a normal course under normal conditions. We propose to do our part; we will see whether the Government think it worth their while to respond. They ought to be able to understand by this time that Nationalism and not Moderatism is the effective political force in India.

Transvaal and Bengal.

There are two crying grievances which have done more than anything else to embitter popular feeling against the authorities and in both cases the populations most directly affected have resorted to passive resistance as the only remedy open to them. The first is the gross and systematic oppression now being practised on the Indians in the Transvaal, the other the repression of national aspirations towards unity and self-development in Bengal, typified by Partition and Deportation. Nothing can be more inconsistent than the attitude taken by the Moderate Convention towards these two questions. They have telegraphed their sympathy with the heroic passive resistance of the Transvaal Indians; they have shown their sympathy with Bengal by boycotting our boycott. Eighteen thousand rupees were promised for the Transvaal Indians in the one scene of enthusiasm which relieved the depressed dullness of the proceedings, and although we have little hope that this spasmodic activity will be followed up by steady support, it is better than nothing. On the other hand the Bengal questions were left to be moved by Bengalis, the Partition to S. J. Bhupendranath, the Deportations to Mr. A. Chaudhuri. A deputation was appointed by the Convention to proceed to lay the question of Partition once more before Lord Morley; and of whom, think you, the deputation is to consist? S. J. Surendranath Banerji and S. J. Bhupendranath Bose. Not a single Moderate deputy is forthcoming from the whole of India to support Bengal even to this extent in its bitter and arduous struggle. Yet men are not ashamed to go from Bengal as self-elected delegates to a Convention which has disowned and dishonoured Bengal and which Bengal has disowned.

Our Cheap Edition.

The difficulty felt by many students and educated men of small means in buying the Karmayogin at its ordinary price of two annas, has been so much pressed on our attention that we have found it necessary to bring out a cheaper edition at one anna a copy. It is not an easy thing in this country to establish a weekly review of this standard written in English; and it has therefore been necessary for us at the outset to place a price on the paper which should ensure its being self-supporting even with a limited circulation. The Karmayogin, however, is now sufficiently successful to allow of a concession of this kind being made without financial injury. The subscribers to the dearer edition will be compensated by the superior get-up and paper, while the cheaper edition will remove the grievance of the large number who have hitherto been debarred from reading the review by their scanty means.

NATIONAL EDUCATION.

From the beginning of the national movement, in spite of its enthusiasm, force, innate greatness, a defect has made itself apparent, a fatality of insufficient effectiveness has pursued it, which showed that there was a serious flaw somewhere in this brilliant opening of a new era. The nature of that flaw has been made manifest by the period of trial in which, for a time, the real force which made for success has been temporarily withdrawn, so that the weaknesses still inherent in the nation might be discovered and removed. The great flaw was the attempt to combine the new with the old, to subject the conduct of the resurgence of India to the aged, the cautious, the hesitating, men out of sympathy with the spirit of the new age, unable to grasp the needs of the future, afraid to apply the bold and radical methods which could alone transform the nation, sweep out the rottenness in our former corrupt nature and, by purifying Bengal, purify India. It is now apparent that it was the Nationalist element which by its energy, courage, boldness of thought, readiness to accept the conditions of progress, gave the movement its force and vitality. Wherever that force has been withdrawn, the movement has collapsed. The older men have shown themselves utterly unable either to supply the moral force that would sustain the forward march of the nation or the brain-power to grapple with national problems. In swadeshi the force of sentiment supplied, and the persistence of the great mass of silent nationalism in resisting any attempt to draw back from boycott has preserved the movement to prefer indigenous and boycott foreign goods, but the withdrawal of active Nationalist endeavour has resulted in the stoppage of progress. Swadeshi maintains itself, it no longer advances. National Education languishes because the active force has been withdrawn from it; it does not absolutely perish because a certain amount of Nationalist self-devotion has entrenched itself in this last stronghold and holds it against great odds under the most discouraging circumstances. A certain amount only,—because part of the active enthusiasm and self-sacrifice which created the movement, has been deliberately extruded from it in obedience to fear or even baser motives, part has abandoned it in disgust at the degeneration of the system in incapable hands and the rest is now finding its self-devotion baffled and deprived of the chance of success by the same incapacity and weakness at headquarters.

The National Council of Education, as it is at present composed, has convicted itself of entire incapacity whether to grasp the meaning of the movement or to preserve or create the conditions of its success. To the majority of the members it is merely an interesting academical experiment in which they can embody some of their pet hobbies or satisfy a general vague dissatisfaction with the established University system. To others the only valuable part of it is the technical instruction given in its workshops. The two or three who at all regard it as part of a great national movement, are unnerved by fear, scepticism and distrust and, by introducing the principles of Chanakya into its public policy, are depriving it of the first condition of its continued existence. It is folly to expect that the nation at large will either pay heavily or make great sacrifices merely to support an interesting academic experiment, still less to allow a few learned men to spoil the intellectual development of the race by indulging their hobbies at the public expense. That the people will not support a mere technical education divorced from that general humanistic training which is essential to national culture, has been sufficiently proved by the failure of Mr. Palit's Technical College to command adequate financial support. Unless this movement is carried on, as it was undertaken, as part of a great movement of national resurgence, unless it is made, visibly to all, a nursery of patriotism and a mighty instrument of national culture, it cannot succeed. It is foolish to expect men to make great sacrifices while discouraging their hope and enthusiasm. It is not intellectual recognition of duty that compels sustained self-sacrifice in masses of men; it is hope, it is the lofty ardour of a great cause, it is the enthusiasm of a noble and courageous effort. It is amazing that men calling themselves educated and presuming to dabble with public movements should be blind to the fact that the success or failure of National Education is intimately bound up with and, indeed, entirely depends upon the fortunes of the great resurgence which gave it birth. They seem to labour under the delusion that it was an academical and not a national impulse which induced men to support this great effort, and they seek to save the institution from a premature death by exiling from it the enthusiasm that made it possible. They cannot ignore the service done by that enthusiasm, but they regard it merely as the ladder by which they climbed and are busy trying to kick it down. They are really shutting off the steam, yet expect the locomotive to go on.

The successful organisation of the Bengal National College in Calcutta was the work of its able and enthusiastic Superintendent aided by a body of young and self-sacrificing workers. The National Council which nominally controlled, in reality only hampered it; all that the Council contributed to the system, was its defects. The schools in the Mofussil were created by the enthusiasm of the Nationalist party, the propaganda of its leaders and the ardent self-devotion of little bands of workers who gave their self-sacrifice and enthusiasm to lay the foundations. The Nationalist Council has never lifted a single finger to help the Mofussil schools, beyond doling out unsubstantial grants to maintain them merely as necessary feeders of the Calcutta institution. But unless a movement of this kind is supported by wise organization and energetic propagandism emanating from an active central authority, it must soon sink under the weight of unsolved problems, unsurmounted difficulties and unamended defects. The curriculum of the Council is extraordinarily elaborate and expensive, and involves a great outlay for the formation of library, laboratory, and workshops, and, arranged as it is on the vicious Western system of driving many subjects at a time into the growing intellect, is slow, cumbersome, a strain on the mind of the students, wasteful of time, impossible without an unusual number of good teachers. The financial problem created is one of crushing difficulty, yet the Council think they have done their duty when they have created the problem and do not seem even to dream that there is any call on them to solve it. Even for the Calcutta College in whose maintenance they are more keenly interested, they can only make feeble and spasmodic efforts when, as annually happens, there is a deficit in the budget. The academical problem of teaching so many subjects in so short a time without outdoing the exploits of the Calcutta University as a brain-killing and life-shortening machine, does not seem to occur to these lofty and secluded minds. They are content with creating the problem and maintaining it by their system of examinations. Even if funds were forthcoming, there would still be the necessity of providing a regular and plentiful supply of teachers trained in an entirely new system of instruction. This urgent problem the Council has systematically ignored, and not even the elementary steps of establishing a Teacher's Training Class in Calcutta and issuing a series of suitable books in the vernacular has been attempted. The only problems which the Council seems willing to grapple with are, first, the problem of supporting National Education without incurring the wrath of the officials and, secondly, the problem of evading the spirit of the clause which forbids it to subject itself to any form of Government control.

while observing the letter so as to prevent the invalidation of its endowments.

But if the National Council is content to fail in its duty, the country cannot be content to allow this great educational enterprise to perish. We do not know how or by whom the Council is elected. It seems to have followed the example of so many bodies in India which have started as democratic institutions and ended as close corporations self-electing and self-elected. But if it is impossible to alter the component character of this body and put into it keener blood and clearer brains, some other centre of effort must be created which will undertake to grapple with the problems of National Education, the supply of trained and self-devoted teachers and of books which will guide them in the imparting of knowledge on new lines, the reawakening of interest, hope and enthusiasm in the country, the provision of the necessary funds to the mofussil schools, the forcing on the Council by the pressure of public opinion of a more rational and a more national system of teaching. But the first condition of success is the reawakening of the national movement all along the line, and this can only be done by the organisation and resolute activity of the Nationalist party.

STEAD AND MASKELYNE.

—oOo—

The vexed question of spirit communication has become a subject of permanent public controversy in England. So much that is of the utmost importance to our views of the world, religion, science, life, philosophy, is crucially interested in the decision of this question, that no fresh proof or disproof, establishment or refutation of this genuineness and significance of spirit communications can go disregarded. But no discussion of the question which proceeds merely on first principles can be of any value. It is a matter of evidence, of the value of the evidence and of the meaning of the evidence. If the ascertained facts are in favour of spiritualism, it is no argument against the facts that they contradict the received dogmas of science or excite the ridicule alike of the enlightened sceptic and of the matter-of-fact citizen. If they are against spiritualism, it does not help the latter that it supports religion or pleases the imagination and flatters the emotions of mankind. Facts are what we desire, not enthusiasm or ridicule; evidence is what we have to weigh, not unsupported arguments or questions of fitness or probability. The improbable may be true, the probable entirely false.

In judging the evidence, we must attach especial importance to the opinion of men who have dealt with the facts at first hand. Recently, two such men have put succinctly their arguments for and against the truth of spiritualism. Mr. W. T. Stead and the famous conjurer, Mr. Maskelyne. We will deal with Mr. Maskelyne first, who totally denies the value of the facts on which spiritualism is based. Mr. Maskelyne puts forward two absolutely inconsistent theories, first, that spiritualism is all fraud and humbug, the second, that it is all subconscious mentality. The first was the theory which has hitherto been held by the opponents of the new phenomena, the second the theory to which they are being driven by an accumulation of indisputable evidence. Mr. Maskelyne, himself a professed master of jugglery and illusion, is naturally disposed to put down all mediums as irregular competitors in his own art; but the fact that a conjuror can produce an illusory phenomenon, is no proof that all phenomena are conjuring. He further argues that no spiritualistic phenomena have been produced when he could persuade Mr. Stead to adopt conditions which precluded fraud. We must know Mr. Maskelyne's conditions and have Mr. Stead's corroboration of this statement before we can be sure of the value we must attach to this kind of refutation. In any case we have the indisputable fact that Mr. Stead himself has been the medium in some of the most important and best ascertained of the phenomena. Mr. Maskelyne knows that Mr. Stead is an honourable man incapable of a huge and impudent fabrication of this kind and he is therefore compelled to fall back on the wholly unproved theory of the subconscious mind. His arguments do not strike us as very convincing. Because we often write without noticing what we are writing, mechanically, therefore, says this profound thinker, automatic writing must be the same kind of mental process. The one little objection to this sublimely felicitous argument is that automatic writing has no resemblance whatever to mechanical writing. When a man writes mechanically, he does not notice what he is writing; when he writes automatically, he notices it carefully and has his whole attention fixed on it. When he writes mechanically, his hand records something that it is in his mind to write; when he writes automatically, his hand transcribes something which it is not in his mind to write and which is often the reverse of what his mind would tell him to write. Mr. Maskelyne further gives the instance of a lady writing a letter and unconsciously putting an old address which, when afterwards questioned she could not remember. This amounts to no more than a fit of absent-mindedness in which an old forgotten fact rose to the surface of the mind and by the revival of old habit was reproduced on the paper, but again sank out of immediate consciousness as soon as the mind returned to the present. This is a mental phenomenon essentially of the same class as our continuing unintentionally to write the date of the last year even in this year's letters. In one case it is the revival, in the other the persistence of an old habit. What has this to do with the phenomena of automatic writing which are of an entirely different class and not attended by absent-mindedness at all? Mr. Maskelyne makes no attempt to explain the writing of facts in their nature unknowable to the medium, or of repeated predictions of the future, which are common in automatic communications.

On the other side Mr. Stead's arguments are hardly more convincing. He bases his belief, first, on the nature of the communications from his son and others in which he could not be deceived by his own mind and, secondly, on the fact that not only statements of the past, but predictions of the future occur freely. The first argument is of no value unless we know the nature of the communication and the possibility or impossibility of the facts stated having been previously known to Mr. Stead. The second is also not conclusive in itself. There are some predictions which a keen mind can make by inference or guess, but, if we notice the hits and forget the misses, we shall believe them to be prophetic and not ordinary previsions. The real value of Mr. Stead's defence of the phenomena lies in the remarkable concrete instance he gives of a prediction from which this possibility is entirely excluded. The spirit of Julia, he states, predicted the death within the year of an acquaintance who, within the time stated, suffered from two illnesses, in one of which the doctors despaired of her recovery. On each occasion the predicting spirit was naturally asked whether the illness was not to end in the death predicted, and on each she gave an unexpected negative answer and finally predicted a death by other than natural means. As a matter of fact, the lady in question before, the year was out, leaped out of a window and was killed. This remarkable prophecy was obviously neither a successful inference nor a fortunate guess, nor even a surprising coincidence. It is a convincing and indisputable prophecy. Its appearance in the automatic writing can only be explained either by the assumption that Mr. Stead has a subliminal self, calling itself Julia, gifted with an absolute and exact power of prophecy denied to the man as we know him,—a violent, bizarre and unproved assumption,—or by the admission that there was a communicant with superior powers to ordinary humanity using the hand of the writer. Who that was, Julia or another, ghost, spirit or other being, is a question that lies beyond. This controversy, with the worthlessness of the arguments on either side and the supreme worth of the one concrete and precise fact given, is a signal proof of our contention that, in deciding this question, it is not a priori arguments, but facts used for their evidential value as an impartial lawyer would use them, that will eventually prevail.

ANANDAMATH.

CHAPTER XII.

It was after much tribulation that Mohendra and Kalyani met again. Kalyani flung herself down and wept, Mohendra wept even more than she. The weeping over, there was much ado of wiping the eyes, for as often as the eyes were wiped, the tears began to come again. But when at last the tears had ceased to come, the thought of food occurred to Kalyani. She asked Mohendra to partake of the food which the ascetic's followers had kept with her. In this time of famine there was no chance of ordinary food and vegetables, but whatever there was in the country, was to be had in plenty among the Children. That forest was inaccessible to ordinary men. Whenever there was a tree with fruit upon it, famishing men stripped it of what it bore, but none other than the Children had access to the fruit of the trees in this impenetrable wilderness. For this reason the ascetic's followers had been able to bring for Kalyani plenty of forest fruits and some milk. In the property of the Sannyasin were included a number of cows. At Kalyani's request, Mohendra first took some food, afterwards Kalyani sat apart and eat something of what he had left. She gave some of the milk to her child and kept the rest to feed her with again. Then both of them, overcome with sleep, took rest for a while. When they woke, they began to discuss where they should go next. "We left home" said Kalyani "in fear of danger and misfortune, but I now see there are greater dangers and misfortunes abroad than at home. Come then, let us return to our own house." That also was Mohendra's intention. It was his wish to keep Kalyani at home under the care of some suitable guardian and take upon himself this beautiful, pure and divine vow of service to the Mother. Therefore he gave his consent very readily. The husband and wife, rested from fatigue, took their daughter in their arms and set forth in the direction of Podchinha.

But what way led to Podchinha, they could not at all make out in that thick and difficult forest. They had thought that once they could find the way out of the wood, they would be able to find the road. But now they could not find the way out of the wood itself. After long wandering in the thickets, their circlings began to bring them round to the monastery once more, no way of exit could be found. In front of them they saw an unknown ascetic in the dress of a Vaishnav Gosain, who stood in the path and laughed at them. Mohendra, in some irritation, said to him, "What are you laughing at, Gosain?"

"How did you enter the forest?" asked the Gosain.

"Well, we have entered it, it does not matter how."

"Then, when you have entered, how is it you cannot get out again?" So saying, the ascetic resumed his laughter.

"Since you laugh," said Mohendra, much provoked, "I presume you can yourself get out?"

"Follow me," said the Vaishnav, "I will show you the way. You must undoubtedly have entered the forest in the company of some one of the ascetics. No one else knows the way either into or out of the forest."

On this Mohendra asked, "Are you one of the Children?"

"I am," answered the Vaishnav, "Come with me. It is to show you the way that I am standing here."

"My name" replied the Vaishnav "is Dhirananda Goswami."

Dhirananda proceeded in front. Mohendra and Kalyani followed. Dhirananda took them out of the forest by a very difficult path and again plunged back among the trees.

On leaving the forest one came after a little to a common with trees. To one side of it there was the highway running along the forest, and in one place a little river flowed out of the woodland with a murmuring sound. Its water was very clear, but dark like a thick cloud. On either bank beautiful dark-green trees of many kinds threw their shadow over the river and in their branches birds of different families sat and gave forth their various notes. Those notes too were sweet and mingled with the sweet cadence of the stream. With a similar harmony the shadow of the trees agreed and mingled with the colour of the stream. Kalyani sat under a tree on the bank and bade her husband sit near. Mohendra sat down, and she took her child from her husband's lap into her own. Kalyani held her husband's hand in hers and for some time sat in silence, then she asked, "To-day I see that you are very melancholy. The calamity there was on us, we have escaped; why then are you so sad?"

Mohendra answered with a deep sigh, "I am no longer my own man, and what I am to do, I cannot understand."

"Why?" asked Kalyani.

"Hear what happened to me after I lost you," said Mohendra, and he gave a detailed account of all that had happened to him.

AN OPEN LETTER TO LORD MORLEY.

Mr. W. T. Stead, the Editor of the "Review of Reviews," has addressed the following open letter to Lord Morley:—
To the Right Hon. Lord Morley, His Majesty's Secretary of State for Indian Affairs.

My Lord,—I venture with all respect to approach you with a humble but earnest request. Publishers, editors, booksellers and newsagents concerned in the publication and sale of papers and periodicals circulating in India now find themselves exposed to the summary confiscation of their property and the imprisonment of their agents without any right of appeal to jury or without any hope or redress from an appeal to superior courts. Under these circumstances it is not surprising that newsagents should demand from the producers of periodicals published in England or elsewhere a guarantee that each number sent them for sale contains nothing which might lead the Bombay police magistrate to send them to gaol for disseminating sedition.

My Lord, it passes the wit of man to conceive what Mr. Aston would not consider to be sedition. Judging from his recent decision the case of the "Swaraj" if he had been administering Statute 123A in England under Mr. Forster's "regime of 1881-3, he would certainly have placed the editor and publisher of the "Pall Mall Gazette" under lock and key as persistent sedition-mongers. But this uncertainty as to the measure of Mr. Aston's foot has led news-agents in India to send the October number of the "Review of Reviews" to the police authorities instead of supplying it to their customers fearing lest in the legitimate exercise of their lawful calling they might unawares have brought down upon themselves the wrath of a police magistrate. The fate of the "Swaraj" yesterday is the fate of the "Review of Reviews" to-day, it may be the fate of the "Times," the "Spectator," and the "Nineteenth Century" to-morrow. By terrorising the news-agents the sale of any public journal or review which ventures to criticise any act or policy of the Indian Administration can be suppressed, and in self defence we shall be compelled to advertise on the cover of our journal that we guarantee it contains no independent comment of any kind upon the administration of the Indian Empire.

I am well aware that no man alive can contemplate such a gagging of the Press with more abhorrence than my old chief of the "Pall Mall Gazette"; nor do I believe that the conversion of an editor into a Secretary of State can have effected such a transmigration of souls as to render it possible for you to regard Mr. Aston's decision, backed as it is by the High Court, without a keen sense of humiliation not, to say, of despair. The situation which confronts us to-day compels me to approach you with a humble request that you will mitigate the severity of the arbitrary "regime" to which the Press the English Press is subjected in India by establishing without delay in the ante-chamber of the India Office an Official Censor to whom we can submit proofs of any article which we contemplate to publish, in order that, if it is passed, our news-agents and booksellers in India may be delivered from the dread of imprisonment by pointing to the official "imprimatur."

I hope that you will not regard this suggestion as springing from my sympathy with the Russian censorship. No one knows better than I that every censor—even the official whom I am asking you to establish at Downing Street—will usually be a podant and occasionally a blockhead. But it is better to have to deal with one censor living in the free air of this country, whose absurdities and petty tyrannies can be shown up in the Press and in Parliament, than to live under the hurrow of those who are terrorising the news-agents into suppressing all independent criticism of their administration. I admit that it would be a curious culmination of your distinguished career if the famous Radical journalist of the "Morning Star," the "Fortnightly Review" and the "Pall Mall Gazette" were to crown his administration of India by the establishment of a Press censorship in London for all articles on Indian affairs. But under the circumstances, unless you see your way by some unprecedented exercise of autocratic authority to reverse the judgment of the Courts, I had to see how in future there is to be any liberty of discussion upon questions of Indian policy in the English Press circulating in India.

I pray you then with all earnestness to mitigate the intolerable "regime" established by Mr. Aston, by the institution of a censorship under whose "imprimatur" we might hope to be allowed hence to carry on our profession in the future.

It is better to have our wings clipped by a censor in Whitehall than to be first gagged and then suppressed by your police magistrate in India—I am, Your obedient servant,

W. T. Stead

THE CONVENTION CONGRESS

It will be seen that, as we anticipated, the Congress had passed a strong resolution embodying a comprehensive protest against the Reform Bill. While it is possible to sympathise with the view that, perhaps, in devising a mode of separate election for the members of the community, has been done to we doubt whether any useful purpose will be served at the present stage by raising the question afresh. It is quite possible, as we said that Government will only be too glad to modify the Regulations at the earliest possible opportunity, but we fail to see how the much larger change involving in tearing up the Regulations so far as they affect the privileges granted to the Moslems can be set aside. It is not practical politics, and we quite believe that a practical politician of the calibre of Sir P. M. Mehta refused to make himself a party to a proposal of that character. We have made no secret of our opinion that the grant of separate representation was unfortunate. But at the same time we recognise that it is one of those blunders which are easier mourned than rectified. The people must make the best of an unfortunate situation. For Government to withdraw the privileges granted to the Moslems would array the entire body of Moslems both against the Government and against the Hindus. We put to Hindu politicians whether that is a consummation they would contemplate with equanimity. Most certainly not. Therefore we should have liked wiser counsels to have prevailed than to let a resolution pass which cannot command the assent of practical men. Our impression is that if the representation allowed to the Moslems were not as large as it is, the general electorate would have elected a much greater proportion of Moslems than they have done. However that may be it seems to us that the immediate duty of all classes alike is to let bygones be bygones and to work with a single eye to the common advantage of all. Working in that way it should be possible to neutralise whatever evil has been wrought, and to hasten the time when it may be found to be both politic and desirable, to withdraw the present restrictions.

The leading men amongst the Conventionist have all come to the support of the executive here. Babus Surendranath Banerjee and Bhupendra Nath Bose and Mr. A. Chaudhuri, after prolonged parleying with the Bengal Extremists, have been compelled to leave them alone, at any rate for this year. These three gentlemen, with barely half a dozen more from Bengal, have arrived here.

From Bombay have arrived the Hon'ble Mr. Gokhale, Mr. D. E. Wacha, Mr. J. A. Khare, Mr. H. S. Dikshit, Mr. N. M. Sanath and a fairly large contingent of delegates which is expected to comprise about eighty from the whole Presidency, including Sind. The number from Madras is very disappointing, not more than a dozen having come, so far, with Dewan Bahadur L. A. Gobindaraghava Iyer at their head. The United Provinces contingent is estimated at sixty to eighty. The Central Provinces are also poorly represented. Even from the Punjab only about two hundred delegates are expected.—The Statesman.

"If there were any particular proof needed that Congress has outlived its career of usefulness and now falls far behind the progress of ideas and the march of events, it is furnished by draft resolutions, framed by the wise heads of the All India Congress Committee. There could not be a more belated or lame statement of the views of the class of men, the advanced educated community who are supposed to be particularly interested in the success of the movement. What has been said by hundreds of newspapers repeated in a multitude of representations and put forth from scores of platforms with a great deal more warmth and freshness, but without producing any effect on the bureaucratic mind, is now offered in the form of an insipid rehearse with all its flavour gone, its warmth cooled down and its strength diluted. The condemnation of the reform scheme from the Congress platform at this date is bound to be a useless and ineffective performance, considering that it is the leading lights of the Congress who by the sorry part of blind panegyrist they played at Madras made themselves one of the main factors, responsible for the shape which the Regulation have taken. The police locking the stable door after the horse has been stolen has never been recognised as sound wisdom nor, can those who wish to run the hare and hunt with the hound be regarded as persons in any way capable of getting at the real game. Men who have once consented to act as tools of a policy can never again expect to be its shapers and framers.

The Advocate of India observes:—"It is difficult to resist the conclusion that the Congress, by the mouth of its President has virtually condemned the Reform Scheme in the working out of which its sympathy sought by its promoters.

Of so much of his address as we have been privileged to read, it can only be said that throughout it was temperate and dignified and strictly in keeping with the best traditions of the Congress. That of course, will not lessen in the least the disappointment of those of us who were looking to the Congress, which claims to be a body of great national import to give the people a lead in receiving the new measures in a genuine spirit in which they were conceived."

POLICE RAID AT BENARES.

Babu Ghanasyam Banerjee is a respectable resident of Benares. There lived in a portion of his house a man of the name of Durga Das. As the result of some investigation the Police came in a body and surrounded the house to arrest him, on the 19th instant. The police demanded the door, which was barred from within, being opened by the inmates but they had not the patience to wait till it was opened. They entered the adjoining house of Gosain Babu, got upon the roof and effected an entry into Ghanasyam's house. There were ladies in the house at the time. But the Police without giving them an opportunity to remove began a sifting enquiry in every nook and corner of the house. They seized among other things an old "Bhojali" which Ghanasyam had kept as a memento of his deceased father Durga Das, however, was in Gosain Babu's house at that time and he was arrested there.

MYSTERIOUS REVOLVER FIND.

Inspector W. Mulchy of the Arms Act, is investigating a rather mysterious find of revolver, under a culvert outside the Presidency Jail limits. It would appear that at about 5 P. M. on the 21st instant, three Mahomedan boys named Sheikh Kochi, Abdul Goffur and Abdul Kalik employed as extra hands in the Presidency Jail Printing Press were going home after finishing their work and were crossing the north end of the road near the Victoria Memorial Hall structure. The boys who had been previously worrying jackals that had taken shelter under the culvert by pelting stones were engaged in doing the same thing that evening, when the first named boy found the revolver inside the opening of the culvert. The boy picked it up and showed, it was then decided to make it over to the Deputy Superintendent of the jail. Mr. Gray in due course sent the revolver with particulars to Mr. Halliday, Commissioner of Police who in turn sent the matter to the Deputy Commissioner of third Division, in whose jurisdiction the revolver was found for investigation. Mr. Finy with Inspector Koch of the local thana visited the spot and questioned the lads and made also other necessary enquiries. The revolver, which is a small six-chambered one, was simply useless owing to the amount of the rust it had accumulated. By the appearance of the weapon there seems to be no doubt that it must have been there for a very long time and thrown away by some one out of fear during the house searches which closely followed the detection of the Alipore Bomb Conspiracy. The Police attach no importance to the presence of the revolver so near the jail and as that part is practically deserted both at day and night, it would be quite easy for some one to throw the revolver under culvert and also difficult to be so easily found had that part been more frequented. The police are still enquiring into the matter.

AN APPEAL TO THE STUDENTS.

The Vice Chancellor, speaking of the relations of students and teachers, said he had heard of influence excited on the part of teachers to involve their students in matters beyond their sphere, and to influence them in directions which were not for their advantage. If these rumours were true, no words could be too scathing in condemnation, and no action too drastic. Concluding, he said the name of the Indian student was in danger of becoming a by-word for self-conceit, want of discipline and moral ballast, and other undesirable qualities. He wanted the students of the Punjab to give a satisfactory answer to that by their conduct.

"I want," he said, "each one of you starting on your life's work to sit down and think how you can best frame your life so as most to serve God and man."

THE NEW COUNCILS.

The number of seats on the Bengal Legislative Council allotted to the landlord interest is five and they have direct representation on the Viceroy's Legislative Council as well. It is very much to be wished that the landlords will be content with the ample representation they have got. We understand that two Zemindars are likely to offer themselves for election to the Viceroy's Legislative Council, by the Non Official Members of the Bengal Legislative Council. It is to be hoped they will be better advised and not offer themselves for election. The effect of the election of two landlords by the Non-Official Members of the Bengal Council, in addition to the representatives directly elected by the landlords' vote, will be to give undue representation to the landlord interest and particularly to the Bengalee landed interest on the Viceroy's Legislative Council. Properly considered, the two seats should be filled by representatives of the educated middle-class who, by their training and experience of affairs, would be better fitted to take an advantageous part in the deliberations of the Viceroy's Legislative Council.

DEPORTATION IN EGYPT.

167 PERSONS CONFINED TO AN OASIS.

In reply to questions by Mr. Mackarness M. P. as to the number of persons deported in Egypt under the law of July 4 1909 whether it was possible for them to find the security demanded, and the conditions of confinement in the Oasis of Khargh, Sir Edward Grey has given the following information.

"Up to November 5th 167 persons had been ordered to reside in the oasis having been condemned to supervision in their villages, and having failed to find the necessary security. Their cases were heard in public. I cannot say whether the accused were in all cases assisted by counsel, but they had the opportunity of obtaining legal assistance in accordance with article of the law; and the report in my possession shows that some at least availed themselves of it. The proceedings were conducted on the same lines as those of the ordinary law court. The amount of security demanded varies from £E.100 to £E.1,000 except in eleven cases in which for special reasons it was fixed between £E.1,000 and £E.1,500, but I have no information to show that any of these amounts were unreasonably high. At the time named 85 cases were still before the Appeal Committee.

"Information regarding the conditions in which persons are detained under the law is contained Article 19 of that law, which provides of their employment on field or other labour if they so desire in accordance with rules to be drawn up by the Ministry of the Interior. I understand that the conditions of residence in the appointed locality will have no penal character and persons there confined will be allotted a residence to which they can bring their families and will be allowed and encouraged their livelihood in any way they pleased. Those who have no means of subsistence will be provided with suitable employment for which they will receive proper remuneration.

NASIK TRAGEDY.

Further inquiry into the murder of Mr. Jacksons shows that Police officers and men raided three houses and one shop, situated in the native town and have arrested five persons on suspicion of being concerned in the conspiracy to murder Mr. Jackson. The first accused is Narayan Savarkar brother of Ganesh Damodar Savarkar who was transported recently for life. The names of the other four persons are Shanker Ramahandra Seman, Vinayak Narayan Deshpande, Krishnaji Gopal Kharve and Narayan Krishna Joshi. It appears that Kharve is a B. A. of the Bombay University and is studying for the L. L. B. Examination. The police have seized some documents and have, it is said sufficient evidence to connect them with the assassin Kanare. It has further been ascertained that Kanare is the real name of the assassin. The shop searched by the police was the Co-operative Swadeshi Store of Nasik of which Shanker Vaidya Secretary and Director Charges against two Vaidyas will be those of abetting Kanare in murdering Mr. Jackson.

While searching Narayan Krishna Joshi's place a British Constabulary revolver and ninety-six cartridges, used in Browninig automatic pistols and one hundred more cartridges of another kind were discovered by the police. They were found buried in a brick wall. The Police inquiry is not yet complete.

The Vaidya brothers who were arrested were placed before the City Magistrate and were formally remanded to police custody in order to enable the police to make further inquiries.

A number of shops were searched with the result that some persons have been arrested on suspicion and some important documents discovered.

A public meeting has been called for under the presidency of Sirdar Vinchu with a view to take steps to raise a memorial to Mr. Jackson.

GROWTH OF THE NATIONALIST MOVEMENT IN PERSIA.

A correspondent writes to the Pioneer on the new regime in Persia:—The strained relations between the bulk of the Nationalist party and the members of the Government in Teheran reached a climax recently, when the Siphdar, it is stated approached the Regent with his resignation of office as Prime Minister. The Regent, however persuaded him to reconsider the matter and to continue the work of the Government. There are signs of the growth of an extreme Nationalist party. There is a considerable body among the Nationalists who are dissatisfied with the present Government on account of the latter's slowness and would like to see a less cautious and more progressive Government take its place.

The offer of the Siphdar, to retire from office has resulted in lifting the cloud that intervened between the Government and the people. There is an improvement in the feeling towards the Government, and there is no immediate prospect of a change although large numbers of political societies have now come into existence in Teheran. These societies promise to furnish the future political parties of Persia. At the present moment they are not perfect in their organisation and have no distinct creed beyond faith in the Nationalists, but with the progress of time the number of these societies will decrease. What is, however, of greater consequence to the Government is the rise in the number of secret societies.

The reports of progress by the new Government of Arabistan, Fakhr-ul-Mulk are most satisfactory. Fakhr-ul-Mulk, arrived at Shustar some months back and commenced work in earnest. A few days after his arrival his son a youth of twenty, led an expedition against a notorious brigand in the neighbourhood of Shustar. In this encounter the chief of the brigands managed to escape, but ten of his followers were taken prisoners while ten others were killed.

There is a full in other parts of South ern Persia, and Shiraz has been busy with its elections for the Mejlis. The followers of the ex-Shah seem to have hit upon a novel plan in arousing the sympathy of Europeans in their master's favour. It is reported that a number of them now in Vienna have succeeded in winning over a newspaper to their cause, and some graphic descriptions of their condition in exile appear in the paper.

FREE TRADE VS. INDIAN WEAVERS.

Before Lanchashire turned its attention to India's "true interests," the products of the Bengal and Madras hand-looms ruled the markets of the civilised world. How the handloom industry in Bengal was ruined by Manchester and Free Trade is a matter of history. What took place in Madras is related by a writer in the current number of the Indian Review. It is a sad story, and will be read with mournful interest by every native of India.

To give an idea of the flourishing condition of the Madras weavers before the advent of Manchester plus Free Trade, the writer mentions a particular section of weavers called differently Devangas, or Jandravars, who reside throughout the length and breadth of the Presidency and bulk large in the census returns as well. The prosperity enjoyed by this class of weavers in the beginning of the seventeenth century is impossible to conceive now. When the East India Company first settled on the Coromandel Coast they were struck with the flourishing handloom industry of Madras, chiefly carried on by Devangas. They at once conceived the idea of exporting Madras piece-goods to England. They obtained a piece of ground five miles long and one broad on the sea-coast on which to build a town and fort. Without waiting for the orders of the Court of Directors they proceeded to erect the new Factory and gave the fortification the name of Fort St. George. At this period there were only a few fishermen's huts on the spot, and to encourage the people, particularly weavers to settle in the English possession they proclaimed that for thirty years no custom on anything to be eaten drunk, or worn would be taken from any of the town dwellers. As a result the settlement was rapidly colonised by weavers and others, and houses for merchants and servants of the Factory soon sprang up on all sides. Thus was established the great city of madras.

The East India Company carried on a flourishing trade in Madras piece-goods at the expense of these weavers. How the latter were valued by English merchants in those days, will be evident from the following extract from a rare old document in the possession of the writer in the Indian Review:

Upon the earnest desire and humble petition of Arluu Gurulingam and Pannai Ragisa, etc., five weavers of the Jandavar caste, to be admitted to settle and inhabit with their families and set up and exercise their handicraft trade of weaving within the city and suburbs thereof, on due consideration whereof and the future and benefit and increase of the revenue of this place, we do hereby give and grant to the said Arluu Gurulingam, Pannai Ragisa and to all other weavers of the said Jandavar caste with their families, etc., that are at present here, or shall come hereafter, full liberty and freedom to purchase, build and dwell in any part of the out-town from the Jandavar Street [probably Mint Street, or Govindappa Naick's Street where there were several weavers settled by that time], as far as the river to the westward [the present Buckingham or Cochrane Canal], and to the utmost of the Right Hon'ble Company's limits to the northward, and therein to have full liberty to follow their said trade and calling and to have the free exercise of their religion with its ceremonies. In sign and witness whereof and encouragement to the said new-come weavers, the Governor [Elihu Yale] now hath ordered a large well to be built and given them at his own proper cost and charge for a landmark or memorial of these their Liberties and Privileges aforesaid.

This was before the days of Lancashire, when Indian weavers ruled the markets of the old. But the British commercial geniuses who had found their way into India would not have been true to themselves if they had failed to make the most of the opportunity. Otherwise who can now conceive a foreign trading Company going the length of finding a settlement for Indian weavers tax-free and building a large well for their use and showing such affection for their "Liberties and Privileges?"

Long before the establishment of Madras, the village Arni—a few miles from Ponner, a Railway Station on the north-east section of the Madras and Southern Marhatta Railway—was a large centre of weaving. Arni dhotties and Arni muslins were celebrated throughout the Presidency and even far beyond it. Most of the weavers who settled first in Madras came from Arni. During the best days of John Company thousands of looms were flying in Madras, and the Company had a large volume of trade in all sorts of cloths which were sent home for consumption at a considerable profit.

The East India Company ceased to trade in 1834, and for two or three decades following private English firms carried on considerable trade in Madras piece-goods. From about the year 1860 Manchester found itself in a position to turn its attention to India's "true interests," and only nineteen years after Mr. C. S. Crode, writing in his Manual of the Chingleput District, gave the following account of the Madras weavers:—

"Except weaving there are really no private manufactures of the slightest importance, and as regards it even hand weaving is under a cloud as its days are numbered in India.....Formerly the produce of their looms was much sought after. The Muslins of Arni,.....which once formed staples encouraged by the East India Company and on which not a little of their trade depended, are now almost things of the past. They have been elbowed out of the market in the competition with the European fabrics, Manchester goods especially, and in regard to Muslins and Chintzes, the very ability to make them has died out. The weaving community has fallen into great indigence, for although a very industrious set of people, men, women and children all working together, they find that they cannot compete with machinery." In the same volume, he says that the fineness of the Muslins produced at the looms of Arni made it famous in those regions.

Since Mr. Crode's melancholy record of the steady ruin of the Madras weavers under the benevolent auspices of Free Trade, many of them have "found their occupation gone and their bread snatched away from their mouths." Many even of the well-to-do weavers have had to take to other walks of life for sustenance, and the greatest number are now actually living from hand to mouth, and their condition is miserable in some of the outlying tracts." In Swadesham, which is abroad with the spirit of the times, lies their only hope, says the writer in the Indian Review, and to this hope they now naturally cling as the drowning man catches at the straw.—The Panjabee.

FACTS AND OPINIONS.

Sir Edward Baker's Admissions.

Of all the present rulers of India Sir Edward Baker is the only one who really puts any value on public opinion. He has committed indiscretions of a startling character, he has loyally carried out a policy with which he can have no heartfelt sympathy, but his anxiety to conciliate public opinion even under these adverse circumstances betrays the uneasiness of a man who knows the force of that power even in a subject country and feels that the ruling class are not going the best way to carry that opinion with them. While all the other provincial Governors have confined their inaugural speeches to the most empty platitudes, he alone has sought to speak as a man would who feels the difficulties of a perplexing situation. But we do not think he has helped the Government by his speech. It is in fact a series of damaging admissions. He admits that the exclusion of the Calcutta men by the restrictions attending Municipal election is deliberate, and he cannot be ignorant that this means the exclusion of the leading brains and the most influential personalities in the country. He admits that the Government have taken care to preclude the chance of being face to face with a numerically strong and robust opposition in the Council. If so, the Councils are not a mirror of the political forces in the country, not a free popular assembly, but a carefully limited council of notables friendly to the existing state of things. Whether the Government are to blame or not for guarding their interests by this manipulation of electorates, is quite another question. All we say is that they have so guarded themselves and, as a result, these Councils may be the kind of advisory body the Government want, they are not the popular assemblies, mirrors of public opinion and instruments of rapid political development, which the people want. Sir Edward Baker says that no Government can be expected to run the risk of putting itself into a permanent minority,—such a state of things cannot be allowed for a day. We quite agree. That is what we have been telling the people for a very long time. Unfortunately, very different hopes and expectations were raised in the minds of Moderate politicians and communicated by them to the people at large. If the eulogies of the Reform Scheme and the benevolent intentions of Government had been couched in less glowing language, with less misleading fervour, the present disappointment, irritation and revolt would have been avoided. It is much the best thing for a Government circumstances like ours to be quite frank and say from the beginning, "This much we mean to give; farther you must not expect us to go."

Calcutta and Mofussil.

The point which Sir Edward Baker, in common with all Anglo-Indian publicists, makes of the distinction between Calcutta and the Mofussil, is quite justifiable if the Councils are to be only a superior edition of the local Municipalities out of all relation with the political actualities of the country. It is an indisputable fact that a great deal of the best in the life of Bengal gravitates towards the capital and the Partition of Bengal has made no difference in this powerful tendency. Calcutta is to Bengal what Paris is to France. It is from Calcutta that Bengal takes its opinions, its inspirations, its leaders, its tone, its programme of action. One very important reason of this almost inalienable leadership is the greater independence which men enjoy in Calcutta, another is the higher organization of life, resources, activity in this great centre of humanity. So long as these causes exist, the supremacy of Calcutta will remain. The object of the electoral rules is to destroy the supremacy of the Calcutta men, whose independence and freedom of speech and action are distasteful to the instincts of the dominant bureaucrat. The attempt to decentralise the political life of Bengal is not new. In the earlier days of the new movement the Nationalist leaders made strenuous appeals to liberate themselves from Calcutta domination and become equal partners in a better organized provincial activity. They thought it possible then because, in the first surge of the movement, the mofussil centres in East Bengal had developed a young political vitality and independence far in excess of the old vitality and independence of Calcutta. But even in these favourable circumstances it was found that, though the districts far outran the capital in the swiftness and thoroughness of their activity, they always waited for an intellectual initiative and sanction from the leaders in Calcutta. Barisal under S. Aswini Kumar Dutt was the exception. What the people themselves could not accomplish under the most favourable circumstances, the Government is not likely to effect merely by excluding the Calcutta leaders from the Council. The very conditions of the problem forbid it. They can only disturb the present equilibrium by making political life in the Mofussil as free and well-organized as the life of Calcutta. By their own action they have destroyed such freedom and organization as had been created. Nor can they make their Councils the instrument of so vital a change unless they also make them the centre of the political life of Bengal. Thus they can only do by a large literate electorate, free elections and effectiveness of the popular vote. But, at present, that is not what the bureaucrats desire. They do not desire a free and vigorous political life evenly distributed throughout the country,—that is the Nationalist ideal. They desire to foster a faint political life confined to the dignified and subservient elements in the country while killing the independent popular life, which finds its centre in this city, by an official boycott. They forget that artificial means are helpless against natural forces.

The Non-Official Majority.

Sir Edward complains strongly of the attribution of motives to the Government in the matter of the non-official majority. He argues in effect that the non-official majority cannot be described as unreal or a sham merely because the electorates are so arranged as to return a majority of men favourable to Government. The majority is a non-official majority, but it is not a popular majority. Sir Edward answers that it was never intended to be a popular majority. It was meant only to represent the "honest" public opinion which is capable in most things of seeing eye to eye with the Government; all the rest of public opinion is not honest and therefore unfit for representation. A most delightful specimen of bureaucratic logic! The plain question rising above all sophisms in this, is the Government aware or is it not that the great body of educated opinion in India demand a change in the system of Government involving popular control in the administration, a change which Lord Morley, with all Anglo-India to echo him, has declared impossible? If the Government doubts it, dare they take a plebiscite of literate opinion on the question? They dare not, because they know what the result will be. Is not this knowledge the reason for so manipulating the electorates that they shall mainly represent special interests easily influenced by the Government and not the mass of the literate population? We do not charge the Government with a breach of faith or a departure from their original promises. We do say that the Reforms are purely a diplomatic move to strengthen the Government and weaken the popular interest. Sir Edward stigmatises the popular sentiment which sees an opposition of interest all along the line between the Bureaucracy and the people, as dishonest and unfit for self-Government. What of the very fundamental opposition of interest we have pointed out? It is easy to fling epithets; it is not so easy to disprove facts. We do not wish to be unfair to any one and we acknowledge that Sir Edward Baker has shown a liberality of purpose far superior to that of any other provincial ruler. If there were a chance of any of the Councils being a genuine popular assembly, Sir Edward's creation would have the best chance. But it is not that and cannot be. If he is satisfied with its present composition, his admiration is not shared by the people of this country. He says in effect that it is quite as dignified as any previous Council. We agree, even more so. But it is not dignity to which popular sentiment is advancing, it is democracy. If the Councils do not provide a channel for the advance of that sentiment, it will seek other means of self-accomplishment.

Sir Louis Dane on Terrorism.

The amazing lecture given by the Satrap of the Punjab to the Maharaja of Darbhanga and the other gentlemen who were ill-advised enough to approach him with their expressions of loyalty and of abhorrence at the Nasik murder, is a sample of the kind of thing Moderate politicians may expect when they approach the bureaucracy with their "co-operation." What it is precisely that the various Satraps want of their long-suffering allies, we cannot conjecture. Some seem to want, like Sir George Clarke, the entire cessation of political agitation, because the political agitator is the spiritual granduncle of the political assassin. Others seem to want the entire Indian community to leave their ordinary avocations and turn detectives, in order to supply the deficiencies of that costly police force through which the bureaucracy governs the country. But Sir Louis Dane's diatribe, seems difficult to account for except on the supposition that he is a disciple of Hare Street and believes that the whole population of India, from the Maharaja of Darbhanga to the grocer and the shoemaker, know the personality, intentions, plans and secret operations of the Terrorists and conceal them from Government out of innate cussedness or invincible sympathy with the assassins. It is difficult to have patience with the insensate folly which persists in these delusions and, by lumping all political agitation into one category, does its best to bring about the calamity which it imagines. The fewer rulers like Sir Louis there are in this country, the better for the nation and the Government; for they are the best allies that Terrorism has.

The Menace of Deportation.

Once more rumours of deportation are rife, proceeding this time from those pillars of authority, the police. It seems that these gentlemen have bruited it abroad that twenty-four men prominent and unprominent are within the next six or seven days to be deported from Bengal, and so successfully has the noise of the coming coup d'état been circulated that the rumour of it comes to us from a distant corner of Behar. It appears that the name of S. J. Aurobindo Ghose crowns the police list of those who are to be spirited away to the bureaucratic Bastilles. The offence for which this inclusion is made, is, apparently, that he criticises the Government, by which we presume it is meant that he publicly opposes the Reforms. It is difficult to judge how much value is to be attached to the rumour, but we presume that at least a proposal has been made. If we are not mistaken, this will make the third time that the deportation of the Nationalist leader has been proposed by the persistence of the police. The third time is supposed to be lucky, and let us hope it will be the last. The Government ought to make up its mind one way or the other, and the country should know, whether they will or will not tolerate opposition within the law; and this will decide it. Meanwhile, why does the thunderbolt linger? Or is there again a hitch in London?

A PRACTICABLE BOYCOTT.

Boycott is an ideal, like freedom; it means independence in industry and commerce, as freedom means independence in administration, legislation and finance. But it is not always possible to accomplish the whole of the ideal by the first effort towards it. So long as we cherish the ideal whole and unbroken, we are at liberty to consult the demands of practicability and realise it, not at one rush, but by successive approximations, each being the vantage-ground for a fresh rush forward. This does not imply slow progress, the leisurely and gentleman-like spreading out of the struggle for freedom through five or six centuries in order to avoid the perils of the struggle; it is rather the necessary condition of rapid progress. The force of the hunger for the whole ideal, of impatience with half realisations must remain behind, but the means of each advance must be secured by that which went before.

When the boycott movement first began, it was the opinion of Mr. Tilak and other Nationalist leaders that the exclusion of foreign goods should be directed against British products first of all. The immediate exclusion of all foreign goods was obviously impracticable. But very soon it became evident that the voice of the whole nation in Bengal and Maharashtra was for the more comprehensive movement, and the leaders wisely put aside their own opinion and made themselves simply executors of the national will. Wisely, because at such times there is something divinely inspired in the motions of the national mind which exceeds the human wisdom and statecraft of the individual. It was and remains true that the exclusion of all foreign goods is an impracticable measure in the present economical condition of India. But the comprehensive boycott movement was necessary,—first, in order that the ideal might stamped deep into the consciousness of the people; and that has been done by the very acts of repression which were largely designed, as admitted by Mr. Hobhouse, to crush the Swadeshi Boycott movement;—secondly, in order that the idea of India's separate and self-sufficient existence as a nation might thoroughly replace the habit of dependence and contented economical servitude which English education and the effacement of political life had induced. That work also is done. The idea of Swadeshi has entered into the very marrow of our thought and feeling. It is therefore time now to consider the practical measures by which boycott may be made gradually and steadily successful.

Boycott is essentially a form of voluntary protection and it cannot do more than protection does, towards the creation of industries. Protection serves two ends; it prevents the infant industry from being strangled in its weak unestablished state by full-grown and powerful competitors, it gives a stimulus to it by assuring it a market. It cannot supply the place of enterprise, business capacity, naturally favourable conditions. It can however mitigate the incidence of natural conditions not entirely but comparatively unfavourable, by throwing a counter-vailing disadvantage into the scale of the more favourably circumstanced competing country. This is the limit of the utility of protection; it is also the limit of the utility of boycott. What boycott could do for the cloth industry, it has done, but for the producer to lean entirely on boycott and expect it to take the place of business enterprise, energy, capacity, the improvement of his goods, is to lay a burden on the national spirit which it is neither possible nor desirable that it should bear. The nation agrees to purchase an inferior indigenous article in place of a superior foreign article, not with the intention that the producer should be excused the necessity of improvement and should be able to force the inferior article on us to all eternity, but solely to give him time to improve his methods, his processes, his machinery, his dexterity in spite of the competition of his superior rival. It saves him from extinction, it gives him a period of grace; he must use it to reach and outdistance the excellence of his rival's methods and production, and if he neglects this duty he does it at his peril and it is not open to him to cry out against the want of patriotism in the people because they withdraw a support which he has abused. The nation, again, agrees to deny itself necessities or restrict the quantity of its purchase, not with the intention of permanently lowering its standard of comfort and living a barer and more meagre life, but in order to give time for capital and enterprise to increase the supply, so that eventually the wants of the nation may be supplied from within. If it is found that there is not an expansion of industry commensurate with the self-denial in the nation and that only a few business men are exploiting the national sentiment for their own personal profit, it is idle to expect the boycott to survive. We have noticed signs of a most unhealthy spirit of mutual trade jealousy among Swadeshi millowners, who seem to be under the impression that they are natural rivals to the patron of the consumer. No single Indian producer can monopolise the supply necessary for national consumption, nor can even the whole body.

USE CHATTERJI BRO'S RAZOR AND SURGICAL INSTRUMENTS THE BEST & RELIABLE IN THE MARKET.

of Indian producers combined, at present, meet the demand. Our Indian millowner gets nothing by the decline of another; on the contrary, his prosperity is bound up in the prosperity of all other Indian mills; for the maintenance of the boycott, which saved the mill industry at a crisis of its destinies, depends on the increased supply of Swadeshi cloth. Instead of attempting to rise by pressing each other down, it would be far better for the Indian producers to follow the example of English manufacturers and combine for the welfare of the national industry.

The first condition of a successful boycott, therefore, is the organisation of national industry with a view, first, to the improvement and extension of that which exists, secondly, to the opening up of new lines of enterprise. This is largely a work for the producer himself, but there is one duty which the leaders of the national movement can perform and that is to organise information. The nature of the industries that can be profitably opened in India, the unfavourable circumstances, the favourable, the means of obviating or mitigating the former, utilising and improving the latter, the conditions of success, the cost of outlay and management, this is the information that capital and enterprise need; the Swadeshi articles that can be procured, the place of their manufacture, their price, quality and supply, this is the information needed by the consumer. To organise all this information would be to give a great stimulus to the advance of Swadeshi.

The second condition of a successful boycott is the organisation of supply. It is not possible for everyone to hunt swadeshi articles to their source and purchase them. There must be a supplying agency which brings the goods to a near and convenient market and, as far as possible, to the doors of the people. The difficulty of supply is grievously felt in many parts of Bengal; but there is no one whose duty it is to consider the difficulty and meet it. Swadeshi is in danger of being stifled under the mass of spurious goods, foreign masking as indigenous, which the dishonest methods of European Commerce pour into the country. There is no one to consider the problem of baffling this flank attack and devise methods of assuring the consumer that he gets the article which he wants. The organisation of a genuine and sufficient supply is the second condition of a practicable Boycott.

These measures will help the growth of Swadeshi, but by themselves they can only partially serve the wider national aim which is the heart of the great movement commenced in 1905, the industrial independence of the Indian people. There is no doubt that the great mass of the Indian people cherish this aspiration and would willingly follow any practicable means of bringing it into the list of accomplished ideals. Previous to the great movement in Bengal this idea had been twice put into motion and produced a certain result, but the idea then was absolute abstention from all purchase of articles not genuinely Indian. Such a self-denial may be possible for the individual, it is not possible for great masses of men. The good sense of the nation therefore qualified the vow of abstinence by the proviso that it should be "as far as possible." This, however, is a vague and fluid phrase. It has to be made precise if the movement is to advance from its purely idealistic character and put on the garb of practicability. Some attempt has been made to define it. The boycott of cloth, salt and sugar was made absolute; machinery, medicines, objects of art and literature were exempted. But this was largely an empirical division based neither on a consideration of immediate possibility, nor on a reasoned policy. As a matter of fact the boycott of foreign sugar has hopelessly broken down, the boycott of cloth has had a partial success qualified by the necessity of taking yarn for Swadeshi cloth from England. A more practical definition is necessary.

The first principle we would suggest is to make a clear division between articles of necessity, interpreting the word in a broad sense, and articles of luxury and to have an absolute interdict of the latter unless they are of indigenous manufacture. The first reason for the interdict is that many articles of luxury are produced in India, but find it difficult to maintain themselves because they depend on the patronage of the rich, who are wedded to European vulgarity and want of taste in the appointments of their life. The poorer classes cannot indulge in luxuries; the middle class, in the present condition of the country, should not. An organised preference of Swadeshi arts and crafts by the rich would revive and stimulate a great source of national wealth and reopen a field of national capacity. Articles of necessity can be divided into those indispensable for life and a decent existence and those necessary for our work and business. In the former we can always prefer an inferior but usable indigenous article, in the latter no such self-denying ordinance can be imposed. I cannot be called upon to use an article or implement which cripples my business or puts me at a serious disadvantage with my competitor, merely because it is produced in the country, just as in my own home I cannot be called upon to use a pen which will not write, a lamp which will not give light, a cup which cracks and breaks after a few day's use. But if the home article is usable or if the business implement is only slightly inferior to its foreign rival, then it would be unpatriotic and a violation of the boycott oath to prefer the foreign to the indigenous production. On these lines we believe a rational and workable meaning could be put on the proviso "as far as possible" which would not put too great a strain on human nature and could yet form the basis of an effective and practical protection of Indian industry. A similar concession would have to be made in the case of Swadeshi articles which are too dear for the purse of the poorer classes, but there is no reason why the richer members of the community should not extend their protection to those industries which are compelled for the present to exceed greatly the foreign cost of production and yet have a future before them.

It will be evident therefore that, however far we may carry the boycott individually, there are limits which the mass of men cannot exceed. A considerable number of foreign articles must be purchased even for home consumption, still more for work and business. The question is, cannot this inevitable resort to the foreigner be so regulated as to assist materially the progress of the boycott and prepare the future industrial independence of the nation? This is the subject we propose to consider in our next issue.

THOUGHTS AND COMMENTS.

(BY BIPIN CHANDRA PAL.)

Nationalism and Nationalists.

What is Nationalism? Who are Nationalists? So many things good, bad, and indifferent, are being preached in the name of Nationalism; and so many people, holding so many views, have commenced to claim the name Nationalist, that a little calm and careful consideration of these questions may not be quite useless at this juncture. Both the idea and the words are somewhat new in current Indian literature. The concept has yet to be coined in institutions, crystallised in traditions and supported by sanctified authorities. It is still, so to say, in the melting-pot. Some confusion is inevitable in this transitional and formative stage. Yet it is just at these chaotic stages that great ideas have to be most carefully watched, and the mind of the people trained to differentiate the real from the formal elements in them.

What is Nationalism? The concept is new. Mazzini, I think, was the first prophet of this idea in modern Europe. It was he who first saw the limitations of that maddening gospel of individual freedom, which the French Revolution had preached. The French Revolution was, really, the last word of Christian Protestantism. Voltaire and Rousseau carried out the inexorable logic of the teachings of Erasmus and Luther, even as Erasmus and Luther's were the last word, practically, of Christianity.

The human personality, as having an end unto itself, had but scant recognition in the social economy of the ancients,—outside India. In India alone, among the Hindus, the human individuality received the fullest recognition. In the Hindu economy alone was the right of the individual to be a law unto himself, fully recognised. It was, however, the individual perfected through a long and laborious course of social discipline and thus trained to identify himself with the universal, who attained this right. Thus while in the first two orders of the student or Brahmacharin and the householder or Grihastha, subjection to authority was the rule, in the last two orders of the Vanprastha and the Sannyasin, when the individual at first partially and then completely gave himself up to the higher and the contemplative life, and was, therefore, freed from the conflicts of selfish passions and interests of the ordinary social duties and activities,—freedom was the law. In Sannyasa the individual was a law unto himself. And it was so because he was at least supposed in that stage to have really ceased to be an individual, that is an individual with private and personal ends and desires, but completely identified himself with the Universal. This identification with the Universal has always been the highest conception of freedom in India, among the Hindus. It was the peculiar fruit of the Hindu race-consciousness which has had from prehistoric times an overwhelming sense of the spiritual and the universal as an original and organic element of its intellectual and moral life.

Outside India, however, in all the ancient social economies, the individual as having an end unto himself received but scant recognition. The individual was a part, society was the whole: the individual was a limb, society was the body: the individual was an organ, society was the organism. The whole must regulate its parts: the body must control the limbs, the organism must rule the organs to its own needs,—this was the old social philosophy. This was the old pagan view in Greece and Rome.

The first protest against this view was raised in the Western world by Christianity. But even Christianity failed to free the individual from the old social bondage altogether. All that it did was really to substitute a new social whole, more comprehensive and cosmopolitan than the old ones. The new Church was substituted for the old social authority, but the subjection of the individual practically continued. The Church was the whole, the members were the parts, the Church was the body, the members were the limbs. Thus the old subjection continued, only the authority that controlled the individual was transferred from pagan society to the Christian Church.

But even this transference of authority, due to the personal election of the individual, was a distinct advance towards personal freedom. It conferred upon the individual the right of choosing, though perhaps not of actually making, the laws that shall govern him. Even this choice was a great thing. It was a first step towards personal freedom. In taking converts from pagan religions, Christianity, thus, started with a recognition of that right of private judgment, upon which the subsequent Lutheran protest was based. The right of private judgment was fully recognised in the acceptance of Christianity by every convert. The Lutheran protest, therefore, did not discover a new principle, but simply expanded somewhat the field of the application of an old principle. The authority of the individual was valid and absolute in his choosing Christianity against paganism. It was valid and absolute in his first act of choosing, but it ceased with that first act. That was Catholicism. Luther denied that this right ceased with that first act of choice. He claimed that as originally it was the reason and conscience of the individual which was vested with the right of deciding the truth of Christianity against other religions, so the same individual reason and conscience must have the right of deciding what is true and what is false in the traditional interpretations of the Christian Scriptures and the Christian dogma.

This is the necessary logic of all missionary religions. This is the essential implication of all credal systems, mis-called universal in contradistinction from national or ethnic systems. There is no need or room for the exercise of personal choice in ethnic religions. Every man belonging to an ethnic religion is born into it. But missionary religions are different. Not the accident of birth, but the acceptance of a creed, is the soul of missionary religions. Acceptance implies exercise of choice. All missionary religions appear before the bar of individual reason and conscience, pleading for acceptance. It is an appeal to individual reason and conscience. And the logic of this appeal is the recognition of the right of private judgment.

Christianity in the West, and, centuries before Christianity, Buddhism in the East—both credal and missionary religions,—first raised the standard of personal freedom against social and sacerdotal authority, in the world that is known to us. But every new creed is essentially protestant. Buddhism was protestant Vedicism in India; Christianity was protestant paganism in Europe. And protests are mere antitheses. Protests are always half-truths. They cannot rest in themselves. They create new problems, requiring fresh solutions. They soon reveal new conflicts demanding a fresh reconciliation. The gospel of individual freedom proclaimed by both Buddhism and Christianity, had therefore, to be reconciled with authority, progress with order, intuitions with truth, the individual with the universal. In the sacred formula—

Dhammam Saranam Gacchami :
Buddham Saranam Gacchami :
Sangham Saranam Gacchami :

I take refuge in Dharma or the Law, I take refuge in Buddha, I take refuge in Sangha or the Order or Church,—this higher synthesis and reconciliation was found by Buddhism. The individual, thus, subjected himself to Dharma which was above him, to Buddha who was above him, and to the Sangha or Order, which was above him. The invisible Dharma and the bodily-absent Buddha were both visibly represented by the Sangha or the Church. In accepting the new creed, the individual, thus, became a part of Dharma, of Buddha, and of the Sangha or the Church. Through a new freedom he entered into a new subjection. And in proportion as he was able to completely identify himself with these larger entities, with Dharma with Buddha, and with the Sangha,—this new subjection became, really, a larger freedom. He was not free as an individual, as standing apart from the universal as manifested about him, not as standing apart from the Law and the Order to which he belonged, but only as part of these, consciously participating and actively co-operating with, this larger life. The freedom of the individual in Buddhism was freedom not really in himself but in and through the Universal of which he was a part. This was also Christian freedom in Catholicism. Substitute the Bible for Dhamma, Christ for the Buddha, and the Church for the Sangha, and you have the Catholic scheme of freedom and salvation. Both Buddhism and Christianity stood up with a denial of the old and established order about them. Both were at their start antithetical and protestant. Both required, therefore, a new synthesis and a new assertion. Both arrived at this new synthesis through the help of a new set of symbols of the Universal in place of the old ones.

But the Lutheran protest has so far failed, it seems to me, to work out a similar synthesis and reconciliation. Neither Buddhism nor Christianity repudiated the right of the whole to control the parts. They did not set up the individual as a law unto himself. They only freed the individual from the authority of that which had really ceased to be his larger and higher self, and set him in conscious relation with something which he was able to accept as his own larger and higher self. True it is that the Lutheran protest did not altogether deny all authority, but the denial of the authority of the Church was a practical repudiation of all objective authority. The Scriptures which Luther retained as authoritative, without the Pope, and with the right of individual private judgment, ceased really to be an objective, and became essentially a mere subjective authority. The Lutheran protest was, thus, practically a transference of the regulative authority of individual reason and conscience from outside him to within himself. And with this transference really started the modern individualistic movement in Europe which reached its culmination in the French Revolution.

The new synthesis has come with the gospel of Nationalism. And in Europe Mazzini was its first apostle and prophet.

THE SIMLA EXODUS.

(Capital.)

A great deal of attention has lately been attracted by the appearance of various articles and letters in the columns of the leading papers of the country on the subject of the annual migration of the Government of India to the hills. Some are denouncing it as useless and expensive luxury and dangerous to good government while others are justifying it on the score of climate and long established practice. Whatever may be said for and against these arguments it must, in justice and fairness to the general taxpayer, be admitted on all hands that the question of good and efficient administration and economy should be given the first consideration. It is my intention in the present article to say a word or two on the financial aspect of the question.

The subject has been so thoroughly threshed out that I with some diffidence tread on the trodden ground. But the great interest which is taken by all classes of people in the matter is my justification; moreover, it is desirable, in the best interests of the country that attention of the Government should be frequently drawn to it, as they do not appear to have taken any steps in the matter, and unless that is done the point is likely to be lost sight of.

The exponents of the exodus put forward the "climate consideration" as a plea of justification. No one will deny that the "bracing and invigorating climate" of the hills is better suited for prolonged and arduous work than a debilitating one, but we cannot shut our eyes to the fact the work in the plains is performed as efficiently as in the hills. Are the district officials living in the sweltering heat of the plains, discharging their duties less efficiently than their more fortunate brethren in the hills, or, as their duties considered less onerous? Does the majority of the members of the Indian Civil Service, the custodians of three hundred millions of people, whose work extorts admiration from even the bitterest and uncompromising opponents of the British Government live in the hills? Do the Hon'ble Judges of the High Court and the District and Sessions Judges go to the hills to deliver their judgements? Are the merchant princes, who constitute the backbone of the British Empire in India, handicapped in the discharge of their duties owing to their prolonged residence in the plains? It is no use citing further examples. It cannot be imagined why the stock-in-trade argument of "climatic factor" is put forward in support of the exodus. These who do so, do simply from selfish motives. No one will ever grudge if His Excellency the Viceroy with a necessary staff go to the hills, but what is strongly objected to is the wholesale move of the Government of India with an army of clerks, duffries, peons, jamadars, etc., the cost of which the public has no idea. I do not think any attempt has been made in giving public any idea of the enormous expense involved in the move up and down of the huge establishment of the Government. The following figures quoted from the Government Finance and Revenue Accounts will give an approximate idea of the expenditure; though by no means, is the subjoined statement absolutely accurate as I have, for obvious reasons, omitted various other items of minor importance:

From the economic point of view alone the whole move is to be deprecated more particularly in view of the present financial depression. With the dark shadow hanging over our opium revenue with the heavy military charges, with the increasing expenditure on the railways, the Public Works, the Police, etc., the continuance of the move seems to be an act not consistent with the policy of economy and retrenchment which the Hon'ble Finance Member proposes to enforce in all directions. Though the expenditure of the move sinks into insignificance in comparison with that of the Army, the Railways, the Public Works, etc., it is the duty, of a sound financier to see that economy is effected in whatever directions possible.

Now, after long and anxious suspense, the final Regulations for the working of the Legislative Councils have been published. Under the new Councils Act the Imperial Legislative Council has been enlarged to a considerable extent and its scope and functions greatly increased. With such a Council consisting of 67 members, it seems somewhat impracticable to assemble at Simla when the majority of Additional Members cannot be present and without their aid no important legislation should be undertaken. Lord Salisbury addressed the following to the Government of Lord Northbrook:—"In providing that laws for India should be passed at a council consisting not only of the Ordinary Members of the Executive Government, but of Additional Members specially added for the purpose (of whom some always have been unofficial), it was the clear intention of Parliament that in the task of legislation the Government should, in addition to the sources of information usually open to it, be enlightened by the advice and knowledge of persons possessing other than official experience." So it is desirable in the interests of both Government and the people that this wise and salutary practice should be observed in cases of minor legislation also.

In these circumstances is it not possible to discontinue the move? It is high time that the Government bid something in the matter, but apparently the complex nature of the subject accounts for the indecision. A solution will be found if a strong representative Committee is appointed by the Government to enquire into the whole matter thoroughly. Much time has already been lost and it is hoped that Government will now avert itself to energetic action as further delay is likely to add to discontent and unrest.

PATIALA SEDITION.

The Special Tribunal trying the sedition case assembled on the 3rd after Christmas holidays. Before the proceeding began Mr. Grey, Counsel for prosecution, informed the Court that he had gone through the evidence against all the accused and come to the conclusion that he could not press the case against thirty of the accused persons for want of sufficient evidence against them. Counsel said that he had applied to Ejlaz Khas for permission to withdraw the prosecution against these thirty accused but no orders had up to the present moment been received. Mr. Grey asked for a short adjournment as he expected the Maharajah's orders within a couple of days. The Court accordingly adjourned the case till the 5th instant.

Amir Chand, an absconding accused, surrendered himself on that day.

THE UMBALLA BOMB.

The examination of the bomb which exploded and injured the hand of the "Goala" in the compound of the Deputy Commissioner at Umballa, shows that it was mainly filled with old gramophone needles, revolver cartridges and pieces of iron. The explosion took place mainly upwards, towards the ceiling of the hut which accounts for the comparative slight injury to the "Goala." The man picked up a box about 100 yards from the Deputy Commissioner's house and imagined the package was a tin of cakes or biscuits. The remains of the bomb have been sent to the Inspector-General of Explosives for the determination of the nature of the explosive employed.

INDIANS COLONIES.

The "Times" in a leading article on the Indian National Congress says:—Among the grievances rehearsed there is only one which gives food for serious heart-searchings, namely the treatment of Indians in the Colonies. The Government of India can do nothing without the help of the Imperial Government while the latter is powerless with the help of the self-governing colonies. No truly Imperial question of greater complexity and more vital urgency exists.

SHARMA HINDU BISCUITS.

We have received several swadeshi articles for review which have been ordered to be placed in the market. The Sharma Hindu Biscuit factory has sent us a sample of its Swadeshi biscuits which the proprietor claims to be prepared in such a way as to satisfy all caste rules. The biscuits are well made and of a good quality.

SWADESHI SUGAR.

Mr. Ameer Chand of 7, Baroda Pal Thakur's Lane has sent us a sample of swadeshi sugar prepared by hand which is of a very high quality, well-purified and sweet. As far as quality goes this sugar deserves well to compete with any foreign sugar placed on the market and if the maker can overcome the difficulty of the higher cost, there is no other difficulty that ought to stand in its way.

TARPUR FACTORY SUGAR.

It is intended to set this factory working again as the property of a new company and with S. J. Surendra Nath Mukerjee, an expert trained in America, as Manager. We have been shown samples of the sugar produced in this factory and the better qualities seem to us to be equal to beat the foreign sugar.

ANOTHER DACOITY.

Information reached the police headquarters at Jessore on 28th Dec that a dacoity believed to be of a political nature, had been committed on the previous night last at Nowapara, a village in the Jessore district. It is alleged that a dozen young Bengalis, armed with swords and revolvers, raided the house of a local merchant and carried away a quantity of jewellery and a considerable sum in cash. No arrests have been made. Further details are not yet forthcoming.

THE YUGANTAR AGAIN.

The "Yugantar" has re-appeared again this time from Lahore. It has now diminished to the size of a postcard typewritten, dated Dec. 1903, and termed the new Year's number. It contains a summarised description of the way to make a picric acid bomb and ends with the following reasonable sentiment: "The editor suggest that the formula is the only means of the people for co-operation with the Government. Wishing a Merry Xmas and a prosperous New Year. The Sub-Editor." This message appears openly on the reverse of a pink postcard posted from the Dabbi Bazar Post Office, at Lahore.

AN AMBALA BOMB.

It is reported that the Goala of the Deputy Commissioner of Ambala has had his hand shattered by a bomb which he picked up at his master's gate at 11-30 am 28th ult. It appears that the bomb was in a tin wrapped up in rags and paper and the parcel was addressed to the Deputy Commissioner by name. The Goala took the parcel to his house in the Deputy Commissioner's compound and he was opening it when it exploded.

When the crowd left the meeting at Bradnough Hall on Thursday they were attracted by typewritten notices posted on the walls exhorting Punjabis to use bombs and revolvers and not sit idle and to kill Europeans. It was signed: "The Punjab section of Anarchist and ran to about eight lines.

GARDEN SEARCHED AT BALLYGUNGE.

Mr. Woodhouse Assistant Superintendent of Police, 24 Pargannas, with several officers and constables railed a garden at No. 64, Ballygunge Road, on the 20th Dec. For some time past it is stated a number of Bengali youths have been seen frequenting the garden. This aroused the suspicion of the police and resulted in this morning's raid. The garden was thoroughly searched but nothing of a doubtful character was discovered.

HOUSE SEARCH IN WATGUNGE.

In connection with several political dacoities committed in the outlying districts of Calcutta during the past two months the Watgunge Police, early on Thursday morning with Sub-Inspector Sinha at the head of a dozen constables and armed with a search warrant, surrounded premises N. 45, Watgunge Road occupied by a Bengalee named Begwan Das. The occupant offered no resistance to the Police, who began to search the house at 6 a.m. A thorough search of the premises was made, but nothing of an incriminating character was found. The search lasted for four hours. No arrests were made.

THE TRAIN DACOITY.

The enquiry in connection with the Rajendrapur, train dacoity is still proceeding and Nishikanto Roy and Rajani Kanta Roy who were arrested are still in hajat. Babu Girish Chandra Das Sub-Inspector of Naranganj, with a posse of constables searched the house of Ambikadaya Sing, cashier of Messrs. Jardine Skinner and Co., but nothing incriminating was found.

AMBALA BOMB STORY.

Regarding the Ambala bomb explosion, it is ascertained that a small box addressed to the Deputy Commissioner in name and apparently meant to be an X'mas present was placed in the verandah of the Sahib's kothi during night. The following morning, a darwala finding the box, picked it up as a curiosity and took it with him to his place. He opened the box and the bomb inside exploded.

THE NASIK TRAGEDY.

Further inquiries regarding the assassin Kumar show that he was a native of Ratnagiri, but had lived with his uncle Bharve, contractor of Hyderabad (Deccan), for the last eight or ten months. He was a student in the Art School at Aurangabad yesterday, but Gopal Rao Patanker, who was arrested at Bombay, was brought down to Nasik. The assassin was arrested in a house at Kandawady. He is a life insurance agent of the Hindustan Co-operative Insurance Company.

The Nasik Police were busy this whole of yesterday making searches and after a diligent search found glass tubes and broken pieces of vessels used for holding Picric Acid in the house of Vinayak Deshpande, one of the arrested persons. This house is situated near the riverside. The search was conducted under the personal supervision of Mr. Guider. No arrests were made yesterday.

The following are the names of persons brought down from Yoola within the last two days:—

- (1) Vinayak Sachchid Varve;
- (2) Narayan Gonesh Joshi;
- (3) Shivram Shadashib Sonar;
- (4) Ekmath Balajee Gujarati.

In all 27 persons have been arrested.

The Deputy Commissioner of Police, Criminal Investigation Department, in consequence of information received, arrested one Chaturbhuj Zaverbhai Amon Pattidar, aged about twenty-seven, in his house in Holi Chackha, Bombay, this morning in connection with the assassination of Mr. Jackson. His house was searched and a number of documents supposed to be showing a counsel's complicity with the tragedy were seized by the police. Accused has been sent to Nasik for enquiries.

THE NASIK TRAGEDY.

Chaturbhuj Javerbhai Amon, who was arrested yesterday in Bombay in connection with the Nasik murder, was a cook in the India House. After the India House was closed, he came to Bombay and was working as a tailor in a tailoring establishment. He holds a diploma of tailoring.

The Police believe that all the sixteen Browning pattern revolvers have been smuggled by this gang, of which eight have been seized and the remaining eight are not yet accounted for.

The Police here are awaiting reports from Aurangabad, where special police officers have been sent to make enquiries.

THE SAND DUNES OF SIND.

"La Nature" contains a brief note on the "Sand Dunes of Sind" by M. Roger Ducamp, a well-known French forest authority. He describes with admiration the ingenious system employed by the towns of Karachi, in pinning down the sand by plantations of convolvulus (Ipomoea biloba), which require no water and which gradually are forming enough humus to grow shrubs and casuarinas and possibly coconuts. He is very confident that the monsoon which now passes over Karachi could be tapped by proper tree planting on a large scale. The aerial current of the monsoon is ready to get rid of its water as it does on the Ghat; the moment it meets a chill or an already moist environment such as a forest which brings it to saturation point.

"If the Monsoon," he writes, "traverses a desert region such as those on the east and west of the Lower Indus it only makes the air there a little damper without losing a drop of water. As it meets higher ground and milder conditions, as produced by cultivation and forests, it produces abundant rain. It is ascertained by this time that forests, through the lowering of the temperature which they produce (by absorption of heat) and by the humidity which they produce in the atmosphere (by transpiration), are equivalent to a mountain range. It is more than probable that if from the coast northward Sind was covered with wood for a breadth of 10 or 12 degrees of longitude to the extent of half its area it would obtain the South West monsoon and with it crops instead of sterility. Prosperity and life would return bit by bit to this unhappy country whose fertile lands (an immense alluvial basin formed by deposits of the richest elements of metamorphic rocks) are sterilised simply by the want of water."

PUBLIC INSTRUCTION IN BENGAL.

It appears from the Government Resolution on Public Instruction in Bengal during 1930-31 that the total expenditure from all sources on institutions of all kinds has risen from 110½ lakhs in 1905-06 to 144½ lakhs in 1930-31 and within the same period expenditure from provincial revenues has risen from 34 lakhs to 49½ lakhs, while within the last two years there has been an increase of 13 lakhs in expenditure from provincial revenues. Mr. James who has emphasized the present report officiating Director has emphasized the need for further provision of funds and for a clearly defined policy in the Department as to the proportion of total expenditure which the main heads of education should receive. The number of boys undergoing primary education was about twelve hundred, these representing, 29.5 percent, of the total male population of schoolgoing age. A contrast has been drawn in the report between contributions of Bombay and Calcutta Municipalities to primary schools. The Bombay Municipality spends 1½ lakhs and possesses 93 schools of its own whereas the Calcutta Corporation has not a single school of its own and spends only one-fifth of a lakh on primary education. In Secondary Education, proposals for improvements have been kept in abeyance for want of funds. It is to be deplored that there is a tendency to prefer a bad education in Middle English Schools to a good education in Middle Vernacular schools. Collegiate and Mahomedan educations are making good headway but technical education is being hampered for lack of funds. As regards discipline in the best sense of the word it has still to be learnt in many schools. As Mr. James expresses it, "there is an acquiescent discipline, that is to say, there is not an active result from discipline but there is not so much as there ought to be of respect for constituted authority and of the true spirit of active co-operation with authority."

DREDGING THE BHAGIRATHI.

The Government of India, it is stated, have decided to defer the question of opening up the Bhagirathi river until there is a prospect of making the "Poyra" class of dredger, which is at present at work on the Eastern Canal System available for work. So far as this class of dredger is concerned, Government is convinced of the inadvisability of getting out any more at present until further experience of its working has been gained.

RUMOURD APPOINTMENT "TO" INDIA COUNCIL.

Strong rumours are current in Bombay that Sir Pherozeshah Mehta has accepted the appointment in the India Council, caused vacant by the return of Mr. Syed Bilgrami for two years provided he continued in good health in England. The acceptance is believed to be due to pressure by his Excellency Sir George Clarke.

ARREST OF A STUDENT.

Pratap Chandra Chandra, an inhabitant of Narayanganj and student of the Dacca Survey School, was at Mohanapur on survey duty while he was arrested. Nothing is known about the arrest. The office of Messrs. Jardine, Skinner and Company was searched by the Police Superintendent with other officials in connection with the case of Ambika Dayal Singha cashier of the Company. Nothing incriminating was found.

DHINGRA'S PROPERTY.

The Commissioner of Police was summoned by an Indian at Bow Street to-day to show cause why he should not deliver revolvers, daggers and other property of the assassin Dhingra. The Magistrate asked the applicant if he claimed the property under will or as administrator. The reply was in the negative and the summons was dismissed.

NEWSPAPER PROSECUTIONS

Baba Singh, Printer and Publisher of the "Sahayak", was arrested at Kasur. The Editor is still at large.

Babu Ganeshilal, Editor of the "Aksa" of Delhi, has been brought to Lahore under police custody for trial.

MR. RAMSAY MACDONALD ON INDIA.

Interviewed by the "Daily Chronicle" on arrival in London, Mr. Ramsay Macdonald said: "I have come away with a feeling almost a conviction, that as soon as the Councils begin to work the undoubted anomalies of the methods of election will be forgotten and things will go very smoothly and well. Lord Morley," Mr. Macdonald continued, "has a most wonderful influence in India, and it dates from a time before the introduction of his reforms. The people believe in him. They say all the things he has done which they consider bad, such as the deportations—were done because the officials overruled his better judgment, but the good things were done because Lord Morley wanted to do justice to India. It is a most extraordinary demonstration of popular loyalty I have ever known.

Touching on the wider problem of British rule Mr. Ramsay Macdonald said: "I am quite convinced that we have got to stay in India because what is wanted at the present moment is an authority superimposed on the complicated situations of Indian society—religious, racial, social and political. I am convinced also that we must govern India more on Parliamentary lines and that the day of Government by the "obiter dicta" of officials is very nearly over. By Government on parliamentary lines, I mean that the Governors of provinces and the Viceroy must explain to the Government at home what they are doing it, and must submit to criticism. We have never been in the habit of explaining anything to the people of India. We have simply said to them, 'This is the best thing for you we know you don't like it, but it must be done' and so we went on ruling in this sort of way. One thing there must be more harmonious relations between the administrators and the House of Commons. Every educated native of India takes serious interest in British politics and this interest is shared by the inarticulate millions of the population although they may know more than that there are two rival parties concerned in their destinies. They have experienced the rule of both, and they know which makes for their greater good and contentment. Everybody in India without exception, even officials who are Conservative by instinct and training, wants the Liberal Government to be returned to office again. They are all afraid of two things if the Tories come in. They are afraid Lord Curzon will be made Secretary of State for India and that some one of his type will be sent out as the next Viceroy. He further observed it was sheer folly to treat the educated native as the enemy of our rule, and he added: "The official attitude has been, I think, most unfortunate to regard these educated Hindus as sedition mongers, when as a matter of fact, they are only applying to India the conditions and ordinary methods of English politics. It would be far better to take these men into our confidence and assume they are going to have a great deal to do with the Government of India in future. I am fully convinced that this will make for the strengthening of our position in India."

THE LAHORE EXHIBITION.

SIR P. C. CHATTERJEE'S PROTEST

At the meeting of the Exhibition, committee Sir P. C. Chatterjee said that he would be stultifying himself if he became a party to the present proceedings. He consequently resigned office. It was eventually agreed that Mr. Harkishan Lal be entrusted with the entire management of the Exhibition and a Resolution was passed that he could overrule if he deemed proper the decisions of the Executive Committee. Whether Sir Chatterjee's resignation was accepted does not appear. The Hindoo.

NEWS.

MR. KEIR HARDIE AND SUN-DRIED BUREAUCRATS.

The London Correspondent of the Hindoo writes:—

Mr. Keir Hardie's booklet on India which as you know is mere reprint of the letters that he wrote to the Labour Leader from India in the winter of 1907-08, was the subject of discussion at the East India Association last Tuesday (December 7th) one Mr. R. A. L. Morre a retired Indian Civilian who had been employed it seems in revenue work in Bombay led the attack by a fairly long paper. The usual arguments against the Parliamentary tourist in India, — the impossibility of getting any knowledge worth the trouble of Indian life and problems within the conditions of a two or three month's tour over a vast continent — the necessary shallowness of any opinions about the people and the Government of India based upon such superficial knowledge, all these were trotted out in the usual Anglo-Indian style. The lecturer took up certain statements of Mr. Keir Hardie's and without any careful analysis or even any honest understanding of these statements and proceeded to controvert them in the usual fashion by citing a few solitary facts which are too widely known to need repetition. For instance Mr. Keir Hardie's statement that "the policy now being pursued by the Government is to show special favour to the Mahomedans", was sought to be met by a reference to a number of higher appointments that had been given to the Hindus and "the immense preponderance of Hindus in the ranks of the subordinate judiciary and the magistracy." These are admitted facts, but in spite of it all, there is as you know a very widespread impression among almost every section of the educated Indian community which fully supports Mr. Keir Hardie's opinion. Mr. Keir Hardie's statement regarding the economic drain on India due to the investment of the British capital in Indian enterprises, was also sought to be controverted by the specious economic theories with which Lord Curzon, among others, made you so extremely familiar. China, Japan, Siam, Zealand, Russia, and even the United States, have always been borrowers of foreign capital, and such investments have always helped the economic development of these countries. Why, then, should British capital cause a ruinous economic drain in India? This is the argument against Mr. Keir Hardie. You know what the difference is. While other countries pay only a moderate interest on borrowed capital, leaving the profits of the investment in the country, adding to the productive capital of the nation. British capital, invested in India, draws not merely interest but the entire profits of the investment, leading to the people only the wages of their labour and a small percentage of compensation taken by the middlemen. This is the drain. Those who deny it confuse fundamental economic facts. They seem to recognize no difference between wages and capital. India gets the wages, the British capitalists appropriate the profits, which go back to India again in the form of fresh capital to draw fresh profits. This is the true story. But it is beyond the capacity of copy book economists, whether Indian or Anglo-Indian, to apprehend this truth.

But I have neither space nor time, nor even, to tell the truth, the patience, to critically consider Mr. Moore's paper. Nor is it necessary for the Indian reader. As for the English readers of Mr. Keir Hardie's book, I doubt if even the East India Association, which is spending some money and a good deal of idle energy in circulating "correct" information regarding India among the British people will be able to make any impression upon the large and increasing body of Mr. Keir Hardie's friends and admirers.

THE MAHARAJA OF DARBHANGA ON NATION BUILDING.

The Maharaja of Darbhanga presiding at the Labour Industrial Conference said.

Rome was not built in day, and nation-building to be of a permanent order is necessarily a very slow evolutionary process. We are sometimes apt to get impatient and to hurry forward to reach a goal without going through the intermediate disciplinary stages which are necessary. But the more haste the worse speed. We must be content to do the work that lies before us in our lifetime, to carry on the torch in our own day and pass it with undimmed lustre to our successors in the race. The work of nation-building requires the co-operation of all sections of the community. And it is gratifying to find that this feeling of good fellowship and co-operation is beginning to manifest itself largely amongst the Mahomedan and Hindu communities everywhere in India. And why should it not be so? Why should not all the separate sections come closer together furthering the common interests of the country? We can be

"distinct as the billows,

yet one as the Sea"

Difference in religious, creeds and rituals there will always be amongst us, but these need not interfere with entire community of feeling and co-operative unity of spirit in promoting the material, social, intellectual, political and moral progress of India. To foster this unity of spirit we ought to bend all our endeavours, by precept and example, for, believe me it is the foundation on which the superstructure of all real progress rests.

A WEEKLY REVIEW OF National Religion, Literature, Science, Philosophy, &c.,

Vol. I.

No. 28.

FACTS AND OPINIONS.

The Patiala Case.

The Patiala case has developed its real objective, which is the destruction of the Arya Samaj, the men arrested being merely pawns in the game. The speech of the Counsel for the prosecution, Mr. Grey, in no way sets out an ordinary case against individuals, nor is there any passage in it which gives any light as to particular evidence against the persons on their trial, but from beginning to end it is an arrangement of the Arya Samaj as a body whose whole object, semi-open rather than secret, is the subversion of British rule. Mr. Norton, taking advantage of the presence of Sj. Aurobindo Ghose in the dock, attempted to build up in the Alipur Case an elaborate indictment of the whole national movement as a gigantic conspiracy, but he did not neglect the individual cases and made some attempt to conceal the extra judicial object of his oratory by a continual reference to actual evidence, relevant or irrelevant, in the case. Mr. Grey has not given himself that trouble. The political character of his advocacy is open and avowed. But he follows his Calcutta precursor in the ludicrous jumps of his logic from trivial premises to gigantically incongruous conclusions, in his heroic attempt to make bricks out of straw. His chief arguments are that the Arya Samajists read the Amrita Bazar Patrika and the Punjabee,—to say nothing of the long defunct Bande Mataram,—and that some of the prominent members of the Arya Samaj are politicians and yet remain members of the Arya Samaj. The perfectly general interpretations by Swami Dayananda of the Vedic view of politics, are the basis of his attack, and even the vehement character of the great reformer's polemics against other religions, the orthodox Hindu included, are pressed into the service of this unique argument. And all this is used to prejudice men under trial on a serious charge. Mr. Norton trifled with the traditions of the British bar by his pressing of trivial and doubtful evidence against the accused in the Alipur case, but it seems to us that Mr. Grey has departed still farther from those lofty traditions. And what if the Patiala Court decides that the Arya Samaj is a seditious body, seditious in origin, seditious in intention, seditious in action? Will the Government prescribe as an illegal association this wealthy, powerful and highly organised community containing more than half the brains and activity of the Punjab? Already the charge has been made that by giving special privileges to the Mahomedans, the Government have abandoned definitely the principle of religious neutrality on which their rule has hitherto been founded. The present Governor of the Punjab is possibly capable of such a step,—after the whitewashing of the Police in the Gulab Bano case and his speech to the Loyalist deputation, we can believe him capable of any rash and headstrong step. Fortunately, there is little likelihood that Mr. Grey's oratory will be any more effective than Mr. Norton's.

The Arya Samaj and Politics.

We have received a communication from a member of the Samaj in which he puts to us certain printed questions relating to the aims, character and works of the Samaj and of its founder's teachings. We have not that direct and firsthand knowledge which would enable us to answer these questions with any authority. But on the general question our views are known. Aryaism is not an independent religion. It is avowedly an attempt to revive the Vedic religion in its pristine purity. The Vedic religion is a national religion, and it embraces in its scope all the various activities of the national life. Swami Dayananda as a restorer of Vedicism included the theory of politics in his scope and revealed the intensely national character of the Hindu religion and morality. His work was avowedly a work of national regeneration. In dealing with the theory of politics as based on the Vedic religion he had naturally to include the truth that independence is the true and normal condition of a nation and all lapse into subjection must be a sin and degeneration, temporary in its nature. No man can deny this great truth. Freedom is the goal of humanity and Aryaism was in its nature a gospel of freedom, individual freedom, social freedom, intellectual freedom, freedom in all things, and the accomplishment of such an all-pervading liberation cannot come about without bringing national freedom in its train. If to perceive these truths of Vedism and of nature is to be political and seditious, then Swami Dayananda's teaching was political and seditious and the religion he preached may be stigmatised as political and seditious. But if sedition be limited to its proper meaning, an attempt by illegal and violent means to bring about the fall of the established authority or prepare by word or action lawless opposition and revolution, then there is no sedition in the Swami's preaching or in the belief and actions of the Arya-Samaj. They use the perfectly legitimate means of strengthening the national life at all points and their objective is national regeneration through an active and free religion, not political revolution. Individual members may be Loyalists, Moderates, Nationalists even Terrorists, but a religious body is not responsible for the political opinions of its individual members. The religious teaching of Swami Dayananda was inspired by national motives, not political; and the aims of the Arya Samaj are national not political.

The Arya Disclaimer.

The leaders of the Arya Samaj have issued a manifesto disclaiming the political motives attributed to them by the Counsel for the Prosecution in his extraordinary opening address at Patiala. But is there any use in these repeated disclaimers? To a certain type of official mind, not in the minority in this country, every movement, body, organ of opinion or centre of activity that makes for national strength, efficiency or manhood is by that very fact suspect and indeed self-convicted as seditious and its very existence a crime to be punished by the law. The Governor of the Panjab is either himself an official of this class or aided by advisers of that temper. Under such circumstances it is enough to issue once for all a strong and dignified repudiation of the charge and then proceed calmly with the great work the Samaj has undertaken, serenely strong and unperturbed in good fortune or evil fortune, good report or evil report, confident in God's grace and the spiritual force communicated by the founder. This is the only course worthy of a manly community professing a robust and virile religion. Anxious repetition of unheeded disclaimers seems to us undignified and futile, What is Sedition?

The question, what is sedition, one of those Chinese puzzles which it seems impossible to solve, nevertheless, presses for solution. In Nagpur it has been established that to laugh at the holder of a Government title is sedition. In the Swaraj Case Justice Chandavarkar has declared it to be the law that to condemn terrorism in strong language and trace it to its source is sedition. At Patiala it is contended that to read the Amrita Bazar Patrika and the Punjabee is sedition. We are not quite sure that at Patiala the prosecuting counsel did not hint that to bring Christianity or Mahomedanism into contempt or hatred is sedition. And we have these remarkable cases in the Punjab, where to translate Seeley's Expansion of England or Mr. Bryan's opinion of British rule in India seems to have a fair chance of being established as sedition. Mr. Stead's Review of Reviews is now known to be a seditious publication. We are not sure, either, that the Indian Daily News is not even worse, for it is continually trying to bring the police, who are an indispensable part of the Government established by law, into contempt and hatred, and the incorrigible persistence of its efforts is sufficient proof of motive, if not of conspiracy. Now one of the charges against a Punjab accused is that he wrote impugning the character of the subordinate police service—just like the Indian Daily News or Sir Andrew Fraser. We would suggest that Sir Andrew Fraser should be arrested in England and brought here to answer to the outraged police for the remarks passed by the Police Commission. The reasoning is perfectly fair. Any strong criticism, especially, if it is persistent, lowers the reputation of the Government and creates in people a tendency to belittle, that is to say, have a contempt for authority established by law. It is still worse if the Government is accused of injustice, say, in the matter of the deportations or the Gulab Bano case; for that inevitably creates hatred. Therefore strong criticism of the Government is sedition. The Amrita Bazar Patrika and Punjabee strongly criticise the Government. Therefore they are seditious papers and their readers seditious conspirators. Every official is a member of the Government established by law; therefore to criticise strongly an official or a policeman, still more, officials or policemen as a class, is sedition. Christianity is the religion of the Government established by law; to criticise Christianity is to bring Christians into contempt; the Government are Christians; therefore to criticise Christianity is to bring the Government established by law into contempt. That is sedition. Therefore to criticise Christianity is sedition. To say that repression fosters Terrorism may be true, but it is seditious. To suggest a Press censorship, seriously or ironically, is to bring the administration of the law of sedition into contempt, that is, to bring the administrators into contempt; and the administrators are the Government established by law. Therefore Mr. Stead's Open Letter to Lord Morley is seditious. We are almost afraid to go on, lest, finally, we should end by proving that the Englishman itself is an intolerably seditious rag,—for does it not try to bring Sir Edward Baker and the Government generally into contempt by intimating genially that they are liars, idiots and good-for-nothing weaklings,—in connection with the Reforms and their unwillingness to put the whole population of India into prison? Would it not save trouble to prohibit speech or writing in India altogether?

A THING THAT HADN'T

It is not the policy of the "Karmayogin" to discuss incidents whether of the present administration of the country or of the relations between the ruling caste and the people. To criticise persistently the frequent instances of highhandedness and maladministration inevitable under a regime like the present does not lead to the redress of grievances; all that it does is to create a prejudice against the reigning bureaucracy. The basis of our claim to Swaraj is not that the English bureaucracy is a bad or tyrannical Government; a bureaucracy is always inclined to be arrogant, self-sufficient, self-righteous and unsympathetic, to ignore the abuses with which it abounds, and a bureaucracy foreign and irresponsible to the people is likely to exhibit these characteristics in an exaggerated form. But even if we were ruled by a bureaucracy of angels, we should still lay claim to Swaraj and move towards national self-sufficiency and independence. On the same principle we do not notice or lay stress on the collisions between Englishmen and Indians which are an inevitable result of the anomalous and unnatural relations existing between the races. It is the relations themselves we seek to alter from the root instead of dealing with the symptoms. But the incident at Goalundo detailed in this week's Dharma is one which the country has to take notice of, unless we are to suppose that the movement of 1905 was the last flaring up of national strength and spirit previous to extinction and that the extinction has now come. We have received a letter from the sufferer translated into English, it is from his own account that we summarise the facts.

A Brahmin Pandit with the title of Kavyatirtha, ignorant of English, was proceeding with two Bengali ladies from Mymensing to Calcutta on Sunday the 2nd January by the Kaligunge mail steamer, and reached Goalundo at 11 o'clock at night, too late to catch the Calcutta train. He and some other passengers decided to spend the night in the steamer. While he was going down to look after his luggage, an European came up to him, caught his wrapper, twisted it tightly round his neck and said in Hindustani, "Who are you?" Getting no answer to his request for an explanation except the repetition of the question, he replied that he was a passenger. Thereupon without further parley the Englishman proceeded to drag the unresisting Pandit to another steamer lying alongside. On the way the latter appealed to the sub-agent of the Steamer Company, a certain Sarat Babu, but, after a word from the Sahib, was told that he must accompany the aggressor to the Company's agent, with a name which the Pandit caught as Joyce. It was not, however, to the Agent, but into a first-class cabin where there were three other Europeans and two English women, that the Brahmin was dragged and the door closed behind him. No sooner was he in the hands of this company than he was charged with having abused the Englishman whom he had never seen before in his life, and a savage blow dealt him in the left eye which cut the skin and set blood flowing freely. Blows after blows were rained on head and body, the head being cruelly battered, the lips cut open and some of the teeth loosened. His appeals for mercy were answered by a shower of kicks with booted feet on his head and the English women joined in the pastime by beating him furiously on the thigh with a dog chain. The unfortunate Bengali was by this time sick, stunned and almost senseless with the beating. The pain of the blows falling on his already bruised and battered head was intense and the iron chain drew blood with each cut. Fortunately he happened to fall against the door and it flew open. With difficulty he managed to crawl to the staircase; but at this moment the Englishman drew a revolver and, pointing it at him, cried out "Shala, I will shoot you." In terror of his life the Brahmin managed anyhow to plunge down the stairs and dropped almost senseless at the bottom. His eyes were clotted with blood, but he caught a glimpse of Sarat Babu coming near him with an European whom he conjectured to be the Agent Mr. Joyce. A few words were spoken between the two. Afterwards Sarat Babu returned and told the Pandit that he could expect no redress from the Company, but he might bring a criminal suit if he cared to do so. The farther happenings of that night need not be entered into, except to note the extraordinary conduct of the Company's officers who almost immediately separated the two steamers and took the Kaligunge mail into mid stream where they kept it until the Europeans had escaped in their steamer to Naraingunge. It was only possible to discover from the luggage labels that they belonged to a jute factory in Nakail near Aralia. There were some Bengali passengers present, including a pleader from Jossore and an employee of the Sealdah District Superintendent's Audit office, but, though they sympathised with and cared for their compatriot after he had escaped with his life, there was none to assist him at the moment of the outrage, nor could even the piteous cries of the ladies awake a spark of resolution anywhere in those present. The sanctities of young men are disbanded, the cry of Bande Mataram has sunk to rest, and royally-minded individuals like the perpetrators of this murderous assault can finish their imperial pastime unhindered.

We feel a great difficulty in dealing with this case. We are not in the habit of dealing in violent language, yet to write coolly of it is a little difficult. And if we describe the assault as an infamous atrocity or describe these English gentlemen and ladies as cowardly ruffians and fiendish assassins, we have to recollect that such phrases are properly applied to Indian Terrorists and we may be prosecuted under Sec. 153A if we apply them to Europeans who, after all, did nothing but amuse themselves. Moreover, any indication of the proper deserts of these people, however carefully expressed, might expose us to forfeiture of our Press and prosecution under the new laws. If we point out that such things seem to happen with impunity under the present conditions in India, Sec. 124A is lying in wait, ready to trip us up, and the Andamans or twenty years' hard labour with handcuffs and fetters loom before our uneasy apprehensions. We do not know whether, considering how the Sedition law is being interpreted in Bombay, Nagpur, and the Punjab, even mentioning this incident may not bring us within its provisions. It is impossible, however, to pass it over in silence, and we proceed, therefore, to make a few observations, treading amid the pitfalls of the law as carefully as we can.

First, we have a word to the Government of East Bengal. It is very busy dealing with romantic dacoities, shapeless conspiracies, vague shadows of Terrorism, Arms Act Cases, meetings of reform Councils overstocked with landholders and Mahomedans. We do not know whether it has any time or interest to spare for little sordid unromantic incidents of this kind. If it has any spare time, it might do worse in its own interests than glance once at that night's doings at Goalundo. It is obviously impossible to appeal to the law. Even if the identity of the assailants were fixed, the culprits would at once bring a trumped-up countercharge, say, of robbery, dacoity, Anarchism or any handy accusation, and the word of a hundred Bengalis, of whatever position or honourable antecedents, would not weigh with any but an exceptional Judge, against that of a single Englishman, whatever his antecedents or education. The only probable result would be to add a term of imprisonment to the Pandit's misfortunes. Even to reveal his name might expose him to the gentle mercies of the local Police in his District. All we can do, therefore, is to advertise the Shillong Government of what has happened and give them the chance of action.

Then, we have one word to say to the nation. The assault was motiveless and seems to have been committed merely because the Pandit was a Bengali and the Europeans felt in the mood to hammer a Bengali, perhaps out of the race-hatred which organs like the Englishman are busy fomenting with perfect impunity. There is no other explanation on the facts. The thing has happened and we wish to say at once that nothing in our remarks must be held to mean that we advise retaliation.

But incidents like these never happen to a brave, patriotic and self-respecting nation; they happen only to those who cower and fear and, by their character, justify men who think themselves entitled to treat them like slaves. When the Bengalis showed themselves in the first ardour of 1905 a brave, patriotic and self-respecting nation, these incidents ceased to happen. If they are now reviving with features of a studied atrocity absent from similar brutalities in the past, it must be because we are ceasing to deserve those appellations. The nation is cowering in silence under the terror of repressive laws, all symptoms of national life are discouraged by the leaders and the elders as dangerous and untimely. Those who dare to speak words of hope and courage to the people, are denounced by your vernacular journals, shut out by carefully devised creeds and regulations from the body you still call the National Congress, boycotted by some of your District Conferences. If the Government see anarchists and dacoits in every bush, you see deportations and house-searches in every lal-pagri. You cower in your homes, speak your opinions in hushed whispers, allow the national spirit to die out and your Mother to go down again into the black pit from which we raised her. And this incident at Goalundo is the first ominous warning God gives you of the inevitable result.

There is only one way to uphold a nation's honour and to compel outrages upon it to cease automatically,—and that is to show that we are a nation and not a herd. If by any means within the law, the perpetrators of this outrage can be made to feel that Bengalis cannot be half-battered to death with impunity, it should doubtless be done. But no personal anger, no violent language or violent actions are needed. The reawakening of the national spirit ready to act fearlessly and blamelessly—for self-defence and prevention of a crime are blameless,—on every emergency great or small, will of itself be sufficient.

THOUGHTS AND COMMENTS.

( BY BIPIN CHANDRA PAL )
Nationalism and Nationalists.

II

The movement of individual freedom in modern Europe, originating with the Lutheran protest, found its culmination, as I said last week, in the French Revolution. Though the logic of Protestantism, with its right of private judgment, was really subjective individualism, yet in as much as it accepted the dogma of an objective and supernatural scripture, practically this freedom of the individual was circumscribed by the traditions of his religion. Individual reason had to exercise its freedom of judgment within the limitations of the Scriptures. The conscience of the individual had to submit to the accepted moral code of the sacred Book. Protestant freedom worked within these limits. The French Revolution, however, threw these old brakes away, and proclaimed a new gospel of freedom in which the individual really became a law unto himself. Hindu thought had of old recognised the right of the individual to be a law unto himself, but only under certain conditions, when the individual had, by long and laborious disciplines, cured himself of his conceit of individuality and had realised, thereby, his or her essential identity with the Universal. The gospel of individualism preached by the French Revolution was of a different kind. The freedom here proclaimed was an absolute right. It was an unconditional claim. The human unit was entitled to this freedom whatever might be the stage of intellectual or moral evolution in which it stood. Freedom such as this, reduces truth to mere opinion; destroys the validity of rational, as against irrational, judgment, both being ultimately a mere conjugation of the verb to think, and obliterates all distinction, on the ethical plane, between impulse and duty. The logic of this freedom, as I have often pointed out, is—"The Woman Who Did."

But still the debt of modern humanity to the French Revolution cannot be ignored. In spite of its excessive individualistic emphasis, the French Revolution ushered in a new era of human progress. It proclaimed the law of right against the old authority of status. It preached the freedom of the individual against the hide-bound regulations of Society. This was no mean work. It meant the resurrection of the dead peoples of Europe. It meant new thought, new ideals, new aspirations, a new outlook, and a new life for the modern world. It created a new philosophy of life and a new organon of culture for Western humanity. But for all that, it was still an emphatically negative movement. It broke more than it was able to build.

Liberty, Equality, Fraternity,—the war-cry of the French Revolution, however inspiring it might have been to the down-trodden peoples of Europe among whom it was raised was, especially as understood and interpreted by the eighteenth century, essentially a formula of revolt. It was not a principle of reconciliation. It was the assertion of an antithesis, not the discovery of a synthesis. It was, no doubt, a gospel of freedom, but freedom conceived more in its negative than in its positive aspects. Freedom was mainly apprehended as mere absence of restraint. And this negative idea of freedom has largely dominated European thought up to our own time. The oft-quoted dictum of Herbert Spencer,—“Every man is free to do as he pleases provided he infringes not the equal freedom of others”,—still represents the prevailing idea of freedom in Europe. And this is Europe's heritage in the French Revolution.

And as long as Europe has not been able to completely work out this excessive individualistic emphasis of the French Illumination, it will never fully understand the philosophy of true nationalism.

Nationalism is, indeed, a comparatively new idea in Europe. The concept is still more or less nebulous and vague. Neither the scientific basis nor the ethical and spiritual significance of it has as yet been realised by the ordinary European mind. And this is because the European mind is still under the domination of the French Illumination. The necessary limitations of the eighteenth century individualism have, no doubt, commenced to be increasingly recognised, but the reform movement has not yet reached the reform of Socialism and not of Nationalism. This is due mainly to the predominantly economic character of the present phase of European evolution. Socialism represents the protest of European Democracy against the existing economic arrangements of European society. It is a demand for a more equitable distribution of economic privileges than what obtains at present. Competition is the basis of the existing economic structure in Europe; and individualism is the fundamental philosophy of this competitive economic arrangement. In this sense, and to this extent only, does Socialism represent a reaction against the excessively individualistic philosophy of the French Illumination. But though to a certain extent anti-individualistic, Socialism is in no sense a synonym for Nationalism. Socialism is a recognition of the limitations of individualism in one department of life only, namely, the economic; Nationalism recognises these limitations in every department of life. Socialism is a theory in economics, Nationalism is a fact in Sociology. It is a higher generalisation.

But the gospel of French Revolution was not merely individualistic, it was a gospel of universalism also. In fact it was this note of universalism which gave to the French Revolution its most fascinating feature. Its deeper idealism was really its intense humanitarianism. And in so far as it was humanitarian, the French Revolution was indeed, in a sense, anti-national. There were only two factors in the scheme of reform propounded by the French Revolution, namely, the individual human unit on the one side and universal humanity on the other. Liberty and equality for the individual, as members of a universal Human Brotherhood,—this was the complete philosophy of the French Revolution. It was individualistic and cosmopolitan, and Nationalism, as a philosophy of life, had no place in its scheme. It recognised no middle term between the individual and the universal. Nationality in its view was the antithesis of Humanity, Nationalism was opposed to cosmopolitanism. It was conceived almost as a crime against universal Brotherhood.

European culture in the eighteenth and the nineteenth centuries, thus, really tried to stifle the spirit of nationality in the West. It is only the conflict of political and commercial interests between the European peoples that has preserved the national sentiment among them. Nationalism, consequently, is a more or less mean, selfish, and degrading sentiment there. It has no no spiritual inspiration in it. It simply represents a scramble for power and pelf between rival communities.

But though Nationalism is a sentiment, Nationality is a fact. And the fact has always been present in Europe as much as in Asia, though it may not have been consciously realised, and, thus, formed the basis of a rational sentiment or a philosophic ideal everywhere. In fact, like every other thing, Nationality also comes within the range of consciousness only under certain conditions. And contact and conflict with other nationalities is the one universal condition of the growth of national consciousness. It is, indeed, the law of all consciousness. Human consciousness is always the result of the contact and conflict of the self with the not-self. The not-me in our physical surroundings, on the one side, and in our human associations, in other men and women, on the other—it is these which always awaken the self in us. Without this contact and conflict, no personal consciousness would have been possible. Similarly, it is contact, and, more than contact, keen and vital conflict, with other nations alone that can call forth the sentiment of Nationalism among any people. And the nature of this conflict always determines the character of the spirit of nationalism evoked by it. In Europe, international conflicts have almost always been political or politico-economic. And nationalism, in Europe, therefore, is essentially a political sentiment. This also accounts for the unusual vigour of the political and the economic life among these peoples.

This partial and very incomplete idea of nationalism in Europe, is largely due to the fact that from a long time past, there has ceased to exist any vital conflict of culture and civilisation among the different nations of the Western world. They are all more or less the inheritors of Greece and Rome. They are all mainly professors of one common religion. Their social life and ideals are practically the same. And there has been an almost constant flow of peoples of one nation into the territories of the other nations, who have been rapidly absorbed into the nation of their adoption. And all these things have worked together to prevent the growth of any strong and fully determined national consciousness among the European peoples.

Mazzini was, I think, the only prophet of the complete national idea in modern Europe. And the psychology of it is also not very difficult to investigate. Rome had lost her empire, but not her traditions. Italy had lost her political freedom, but not her pride of race. Austria, though their political master, was yet a mere barbarian in the eye of the Italian people. Her political domination represented only superior brute force, but not superior intellectual or moral force. It struck not merely against Italy's political freedom, but against the entire Italian culture. It wounded the keen pride of race of an ancient people. Italy's struggle for freedom was not merely a political struggle, but a truly national struggle in the largest sense of the term. And it was the peculiar nature of this struggle which awoke in Mazzini a fuller sense of nationality and a deeper sentiment of nationalism than what is found ordinarily in Europe.

ANANDAMATH.

—oOo—

CHAPTER XII.

Kalyani said, "I too have suffered greatly and gone through many misadventures. It will be of no advantage to you to hear it. I cannot say how I managed to sleep in such exceeding misadventure, but today in the early hours of the morning I fell asleep, and in my sleep I saw a dream. I saw—I cannot say by what force of previous good works I went there,—but I saw myself in a region of wonder, where there was no solid Earth, but only light, a very soft sweet light as if of a cool lustre broken by clouds. There was no human being there, only luminous forms, no noise, only a sound as if

of sweet song and music at a great distance. Myriads of flowers seemed to be ever newly in bloom, for the scent of them was there, jasmynes of many kinds and other sweet-smelling blossoms. There in a place high over all, the cynosure of all, one seemed to be sitting, like a dark blue hill that has grown bright as fire and burns softly from within. A great fiery crown was on his head, his arms seemed to be four. Those who sat at either side of him, I could not recognize, but I think they were women in their forms, but so full of beauty, light and fragrance that every time I gazed in that direction, my senses were perplexed, I could not fix my gaze nor see who they were. In front of the Four-Armed another woman's form seemed to be standing. She too was luminous, but surrounded by clouds so that the light could not well manifest itself; it could only be dimly realised that one in the form of a woman wept, one full of heart's distress, one worn and thin, but beautiful exceedingly. It seemed to me that a soft fragrant wind carried me along, pushing me as with waves, till it brought me to the foot of the Four-Armed's throne. It seemed to me that the worn and cloud-besieged woman pointed to me and said, "This is she, for whose sake Mohendra will not come to my bosom." Then there was a sound like the sweet clear music of a flute; it seemed that the Four-Armed said to Me, "Leave your husband and come to me. This is your Mother, your husband will serve her; but if you stay at your husband's side, that service cannot be given. Come away to Me." I wept and said, "How shall I come, leaving my husband?" "Then the flutelike voice came again, "I am husband, father, mother, son, daughter; come to Me." I do not remember, what I said. Then I woke." Kalyani spoke and was again silent.

Mohendra also, astonished, amazed, alarmed, kept silence. Overhead the dovel began its clamour, the papia flooded heaven with its voice, the call of the cuckoo set the regions echoing, the bhiringaraj made the grove quiver with its sweet cry. At their feet the stream murmured softly between its banks. The wind carried to them the soft fragrance of the woodland flowers. In places bits of sunlight glittered on the waves of the rivulet. Somewhere palm-leaves rustled in the slow wind. Far off a blue range of mountains met the eye. For a long time they remained silent in delight. Then Kalyani again asked, "What are you thinking?"

"I am thinking what I should do. The dream is nothing but a thought of fear, it is born of itself in the mind and of itself it disappears,—a bubble from the waking life. Come, let us go home."

"Go where God bids you," said Kalyani and put her child in her husband's lap.

Mohendra took his daughter in his lap and said, "And you,—where will you go?"

Kalyani, covering her eyes with her hands and pressing her forehead between them, answered, "I too will go where God has bid me."

Mohendra started and said, "Where is that? How will you go?"

Kalyani showed him the small box of poison.

Mohendra said in astonishment, "What, you will take poison?"

"I meant to take it, but—" Kalyani became silent and began to think. Mohendra kept his gaze on her face and every moment seemed to him a year, but when he saw that she did not complete her unfinished words, he asked; "But what? What were you going to say?"

"I mean to take it, but leaving you behind, leaving Sukumari behind, I have no wish to go to Paradise itself. I will not die."

With the words Kalyani set down the box on the earth. Then the two began to talk of the past and future and became absorbed in their talk. Taking advantage of their absorption the child in her play took up the box of poison. Neither of them observed it.

Sukumari thought, "This is a very fine toy." She held it in her left hand and slapped it well with her right, put it in her right, and slapped it with her left. Then she began pulling at it with both hands. As a result the box opened and the pill fell out.

Sukumari saw the little pill fell on her father's cloth and took it for another toy. She threw the box away and pounced on the pill.

How it was that Sukumari had not put the box into her mouth, it is hard to say, but she made no delay in respect of the pill. "Eat it as soon as you get it,"—Sukumari crammed the pill into her mouth. At that moment her mother's attention was attracted to her.

"What has she eaten? What has she eaten?" cried Kalyani, and she thrust her finger into the child's mouth. Then both saw that the box of poison was lying empty. Then Sukumari, thinking that here was another game, clenched her teeth,—only a few had just come out,—and smiled in her mother's face. By this the taste of the poison-pill must have begun to feel bitter in the mouth, for a little after she loosened the clench of her teeth of herself and Kalyani took out the pill and threw it away. The child began to cry.

The pill fell on the ground. Kalyani dipped the loose end of her robe in the stream and poured the water into her daughter's mouth. In a tone of pitiful anxiety she asked Mohendra, "Has a little of it gone down her throat?"

It is the worst that comes first to a parent's mind,—the greater the love, the greater the fear. Mohendra had not seen how large the pill was before, but now, after taking the pill into his hand and scrutinising it for some time, he said, "I think she has sucked in a good deal of it."

Necessarily, Kalyani adopted Mohendra's belief. For a long time she too held the pill in her hand and examined it. Meanwhile the child, owing to the little she had swallowed, became a little indisposed, she grew restless, cried, at last grew a little dull and feeble. Then Kalyani said to her husband, "What more? Sukumari has gone the way God called me to go. I too must follow her."

And with the words Kalyani put the pill into her mouth and in a moment had swallowed it.

TRAIN FIRED ON.

A SEALDAH SENSATION.

PASSENGER'S NARROW ESCAPE.

Passengers leaving Sealdah for the Suburban stations by 57 up—one of the evening trains—on Thursday had an exciting experience, while one European passenger had a narrow escape from death. It would appear that the office train which leaves Sealdah at 5.50 p. m. (17-26 Railway time) was fired on just past the railway bungalow of the railway employees outside Sealdah. The immediate locality is known as Kankurgachi Junction. A European gentleman the manager in a Calcutta office was seated in 2nd class compartment No. 119, reading a newspaper the other occupant of the compartment being a Mr. B. Lawson of Ichapur. The first named gentleman heard a swish and a shattering of glass and the top of the paper he was reading was cut through, just to the left of the middle letter in the title. He was sitting at the extreme left of the carriage (by the window) facing the engine side of the train. Mr. Lawson was on the opposite side in the middle of the seat. All the glass windows on the opposite side were up. The bullet passed through the middle pane making a clear round hole about half an inch in diameter. It was fired from the direction in which the train was travelling. This inference is drawn from the fact that a bullet leaves a larger hole on its exit side; and the larger perforation was on the inside of the carriage. The bullet passed out of the lefthand side window by which the passenger in question was sitting. The passengers would have pulled the communication cord at once, but by time they had finished their investigations the train travelled a good way from the spot and the passengers decided to report the matter when they got to Dum-Dum Junction. The report of the shot was heard by others travelling by the train. In the compartment behind that hit were a Mr. A. D. Abro of 60, Grand Trunk Road Barrackpore and Babu G. N. Sen, Paymaster of the E. B. & S. Railway. The passengers reported the matter at Dum-Dum Junction. It is the general opinion that the shot was intentional and deliberate and must have been fired from an elevated position as the hole was high up on the window.

The belief of the European gentleman above referred to is that it was fired from a garden house on the right-hand side of the line. He looked out of the window immediately (on the opposite side) and marked the position and he felt sure it was just opposite this old garden house. The guard Mr. A. E. Jacob took the names and addresses of the passengers concerned.

It was a composite carriage containing two second class compartments at either end of first class compartments in the centre. The train is a new train, composed of composite carriages. All the carriages 1st, 2nd and 3rd are exactly alike in external appearance, polished teak-wood with the classes printed on them in small letters. This train was specially designed like this so it is said that the various class carriages could not be distinguished when the train was travelling.

It was just dusk at the time, though not quite dark.

Later enquiries show that the second class carriage which was hit by the bullet was detached from 57 up at Bagula and arrived at Sealdah at 11.25 p. m. by 2 down and was kept in a siding near the Police station under a police guard.

Inspector Ganguly, Senior Sub-Inspector Asparada and Sergeant Oetmaun of the Railway Police proceeded on receiving information to Kankurgachi Junction for inquiring into the matter. But it is to be feared that nightfall was handicapping their exertions for up till a late hour last night no arrests or any searches were made.

Kankurgachi is an area between Sealdah and Dum-Dum junction and sparsely inhabited. It contains several garden houses of Calcutta people, while the local inhabitants are mostly agriculturists and fishermen. The place is said to be jungly.

The railway police who are being assisted by Daroga Gunga Churn Dey of the Belliaghata thana made a thorough search on both sides of the line from Sealdah B. Cabin to Kankurgachi. Enquiries were made of several people of the locality but no information was obtained.

The guard of the train who arrived at Sealdah last night having returned from Bagula for the purpose of police investigation said that the bullet struck the train between Sealdah B. Cabin and Kankurgachi, while the passengers in the carriage differ from him by locating the position as between Kankurgachi and Canal Junction. The guard did not personally hear any report but comes to that conclusion from the description given of the spot. In the evening Mr. Walker, District Superintendent of Police, visited the station. Fresh enquiries will be taken up again to-day and most probably something definite may be arrived at. So far the police do not suspect a local man but believe that the shot must have been fired by some person who is not a resident in the locality.

TRANSVAAL INDIANS. LUCKNOW MEETING.

The Public meeting on the Transvaal situation was held last evening instead of Saturday, there being a large and representative gathering. The Hon'ble Mr. Nasim, Advocate, presided. He introduced Mr. Polak and Mr. Gandhi, nephew of Mr. Gandhi of the Transvaal and asked the audience to show practical sympathy with the Indians in South Africa.

Mr. Polak delivered a long speech detailing the hardship suffered by the Indians in all the four Colonies of Natal Orange Free state, Cape Colony and the Transvaal forming the South African Union. The deputation that was to come to India consisted of four persons from four communities, Hindu, Mahomedan, Parsi and Christian, but while he alone could come out, the others were arrested and imprisoned on the eve of their departure. In Africa, he said, they could make no distinction of caste or creed, labouring as they were under disabilities common to all. The speaker took Colony by Colony and detailed the grievances of both the indentured labourers and free Indians, grievances that affected them in their every day life. He pointed out with what hardness the coolies under indenture were worked and how the arrangements lead to a breaking up of family ties and to degradation and demoralisation. He observed in his address that suicide among the indentured coolies was 551 per million while it was only 13 or 14 times less in India. Complaints against employers were hedged round with restrictions that exposed the labourers to untold sufferings both in jail and in gardens. As regards free Indians the disabilities heaped upon them were meant to either crowd them out of South Africa or crush them to nonentity, if not to death. The speaker then quoted General Botha's election speech to show what the intention of the Government was. The General said in four years' time, if given a free hand, he would turn out all Asiatics from South Africa. All measures in the Colonies were, he said, intended to prevent Indians from going to South Africa any more and refuse the children of those resident in the Colonies education and make their daily lives miserable by imposing restriction of the most inhuman and degraded type,—restrictions that no self-respecting man could endure for a moment. But what made them respected throughout the world and entitled them to the respect and love and gratitude of their countrymen here was their refusal to secure all rights of citizenship in South Africa on condition of denying the same to all new comers. The honour of Indians as a race they loved more than their own personal rights and conveniences and this the Colonial Government refused to agree to and the Imperial Government confessed inability to help in the matter. The only course left was twofold to stop immigration of Indian labour under indenture to Natal and help the passive resisters in the Transvaal to carry on fight. To give up the fight was to accept the position of slaves and helots for Indians within the British Empire. Hence was the urgent need of agitation of a persistent and sustained character.

Mr. Gandhi explained in Hindustani what Mr. Polak said in English. Three resolutions were then adopted unanimously, the first being to petition the Imperial Government to remove the grievances of the Indians and grant the Indians equality with other races throughout the British Empire, and the Indian Government to retaliate by preventing immigration of Indian labour to South Africa; the second to express warm appreciation of the brave stand made by the Indians against the iniquities to which they had been subjected, and the third to start an Indian South African League for Oudh to carry on the agitation by investigating facts and collecting subscriptions.

SECRETARY, BENGAL BRANCH.

Wanted agents throughout Bengal & Assam on liberal commission.

Mr. Ganga Prasad Varma, Mr. Sen, Pandit Gokarannath, Syed Zahur Ahmed, Mr. Baharai Lal, among others, addressed the meeting.

Mr. Varma thought retaliation was perhaps the only course left for both the Indian Government and the Indians.

Mr. Sen quoted Lord Lansdowne's assertion in 1899 made to justify the war against the Boers and repeated Lord Curzon's view of the Transvaal situation to emphasise the gravity of the question.

Pandit Gokarannath related Mr.

Ghandi's jail experiences to show the start of which the leader is made.

Syed Zahur Ahmed said submission to the South African disabilities would mean submission in all other parts of the British Empire.

Mr. Banarsi Lal, in a humorous speech, showed how there could possibly be no thought of class or creed interests in the struggle of the Indians in South Africa and said that the jingle of money was the best noise that could be made to express sympathy with those on the thick of the fight.

A fund was then opened and contributions in silver, nickel and copper were made and some promises were also made. Among the latter the most prominent were Raja Prithipal Singh with Rs. 1,500, Thakur Jagannath Anasad, Talagdar, Rs. 150, Babu Ishwaridyalal Rs. 125 and Messrs. Nasim, Gokarannath and Sen Rs. 100 each. Promises of Rs. 50, 25, 20 were many. Collections and promises together would amount to several thousands.

In response to thanks, Mr. Polak said he accepted them as a representative those who were fighting the battle against fearful odds.

THE AMBALLA BOMB.

It is reported that the houses of several Hindus were searched at Amballa on Monday and Tuesday. The raids were supposed to be in connection with the bomb accident at Amballa, but details are yet wanting.

LAHORE SEDITION.

Kishen Singh, brother of Ajit Singh, who has been hauled up for alleged sedition as author of the book "Hindustan me Angrezi Hakumat" i.e. "British Rule in India" has filed a long list of defence witnesses, including, amongst others, Mr. Surendranath Banerjee, Dr. Rash Behari Ghosh, Messrs. Gokhale, Ganga Parshad Varma, Alfred Nurdy, Jaswant Rai of the "Punjabee," the editors of "Hindustan" and "Paissa Akhbar."

In another sedition case proceeding against Kishen Singh, accused has mentioned as his defence witnesses the names of Sir Protul Chander Chatterji and Rai Sahib K. B. Thapar.

PATIALA SEDITION TRIAL.

On the Committee taking their seat on the 3rd instant; Mr. Grey, counsel for the prosecution, in the Patiala sedition case, mentioned that the Maharaja's orders had not yet been received on the reference made to His Highness regarding the production of police reports and the re-adjustment of the list of the accused. The Committee accordingly decided to adjourn till tomorrow pending the orders of the Maharaja on these points. The camp of the accused has brought within Court precincts. This arrangement will convenience the accused and facilitate communication between them and their pleaders.

ANOTHER SO-CALLED POLITICAL DACOITY.

Another dacoity is reported from Hughli. In the early hours of Sunday morning some 25 young men armed with lathies axes and swords attacked the house of one Sarat Chandra Das of Puratan Buga some 12 miles from Hughli town. The dacoits wore false beards and whiskers and were dressed like up-countrymen, but their voices betrayed their identity. They spoke among themselves in Bengalee. After breaking open the outer door they forced their entrance into house and decamped with valuables and cash. While retreating they were opposed by the villagers but the latter were no match for the dacoits. No arrests have been made.

NETRA DACOITY CASE.

On the 5th instant, before Mr. Bompas, District Magistrate of the 24-Pergannas, Bhusan Chandra Mitter and Tincowri Das were placed on a charge of having committed an alleged political dacoity at Netra, in Diamond Harbour Sub-division, in April last.

The Court Inspector stated that the prosecution was not ready with the case, and the Magistrate ordered the accused to be released on bail of Rs. 1,500 each, and adjourned the case till the 12th instant.

Bhusan Chunder Mitter is alleged to be an absconder in the Chingripata dacoity case, in which the accused were acquitted about two years ago. Bhusan is an inhabitant of Sonarpur, and Tincowri, of Majilpur, in the 24-Pergannas. It is alleged that the present accused were arrested on the strength of a statement by Lalit Mohan Chuckerbutty, who was arrested in Darjeeling in October last and who is at present in Police custody. Lalit is also said to have incriminated several others in his statement, and the matter is under police enquiry.

THE CASE AGAINST KISHEN SINGH.

In the Case of the book "Angrezi Hakumat" against Kishen Singha the elder brother of Ajit Singh, the accused filed a list of defence witnesses. On being questioned by the Court as to the necessity of calling the men on the list as witnesses the accused answered that he wanted to call Mr. Gokhale and Dr. Rasbehari Ghose because they were member of the British Indian National Congress Committee. The Court observed that the citing of so many witnesses from far off places would cost a heavy sum and so it would be desirable to issue a commission to record the evidence of Dr. Ghose a lawyer who might be earning a thousand rupees per day and might not be willing to undertake so long a journey. The accused said that in that case he would be denied the opportunity of cross-examination.

THE JABARKOLE DACOITY CASE.

In the recent dacoity at Jabarkole in Faridpur, a police Head Constable is reported to have been identified and taken under police custody. The case has attracted special attention and the superintendent of Police and the public are anxiously awaiting further developments of this strange case.

MISSING GUN AND REVOLVER.

On 28th December last, two breach loading guns, belonging to the Barnalupara estate were brought to the house of Babu Madhu Sudan Roy, who is a pleader of the estate for the renewal of the license. On the 30th, at about 9 p. m., the guns were found missing from his house. Immediate information was sent to the Thana.

A few days before a revolver of sub Inspector Moti Lal Sen was also stolen from his bed-room.

On the 3rd instant, about 60 or 70 constables surrounded the houses of Babu Kailash Chandra Ghattak, Kedar Nath Ghattak, Unesh Chandra Ghattak as well as the Swadeshi cloth shop belonging to Babu Kedar Nath Ghattak and his brothers. After a close search for several hours the police came away disappointed. Nothing incriminating was found and nothing was taken. The enquiry is proceeding.

BOMBAY ANARCHISM.

A "Gazette of India Extraordinary" published in Calcutta on Tuesday evening states:—"In exercise of the powers conferred upon him by section 1 (2) of Act XIV of 1908 (the Criminal Law Amendment Act, 1908) the Governor General in Council is pleased to extend the whole of the said Act to the Presidency of Bombay."

Act XIV of 1908 is the Act which introduced the Special Tribunals for "the more speedy trial of certain offences and for the prohibition of associations dangerous to the public peace." It was passed at the meeting of the Supreme Legislative Council on December 11th 1908. The second clause of the first section declared that the law extended to the Provinces of Bengal and Eastern Bengal and Assam but empowered the Governor-General in Council to extend it to any other Province either in whole or in part. The first part deals with the constitution of the Special Tribunals and the other alterations in procedure, while the second part deals with the unlawful assemblies and procedure for proclaiming them unlawful.

THE LAHORE SEDITION CASES.

The Lahore sedition cases were resumed by Mr. Harrison, the Special Magistrate, on January 3rd. The Court took up the case against Zia-ul-Haq, the first accused, and cross-examined a number of prosecution witnesses. Among others two copyists who copied the article in question which appeared in the "Pashwan," of which accused was the Editor.

Accused Ishri Parshad Editor of the "Bedari" newspaper, was then produced before the Court. The Court explained to the accused that on 14th September an article headed "Fidwi you Ki Bis Markhanian," appeared in the "Bedari" and it maligned the character of the subordinate police force in defamatory terms, punishable under section 400, I. P. Code. One prosecution witness was examined after which the Court asked the accused to study the official translation of the article in question or to put in a translation of his own. The case was adjourned to 24th January.

The Sedition case against the same accused. Ishri Parshad, was taken up. The complaint was to the effect that he was Editor, Printer and Publisher of a weekly newspaper, called the "Bedari," printed at the Bedari press at Lahore, and that in its issue of 5th October he published an article and a cartoon, thereby committing an offence under section 124 A. The accused wanted to be released on bail. Court said that in the defamation case against him the accused could be released on bail of Rs. 1,000, but in the sedition case the offence was nonbailable and consequently bail was not granted.

The case against Ganesh Lal, alleged Editor of the "Akash," was next taken up. The complaint, filed in case was that the accused was the Proprietor, Printer Publisher and Editor of an Urdu paper, called the "Akash" at the Indraprasath, National Press, Delhi. In its issue of 14th November the accused published a poem, entitled "Bharat mataki pukar," which comes within the purview of sections 124A and 153 A of the I. P. C. The case was adjourned to the 8th instant.

HINDUS AND GOVT.

Rai Sahib K. R. Thakur of Lahore writes a letter to the "Civil and Military Gazette" about the relations now existing between the Hindus and the Government. He observes: "It cannot be denied that the Hindu community of the Punjab is face to face with a serious crisis so far as its relations with the Government are concerned. It is well-known that objectionable writings and newspapers and publication of seditious books and pamphlets have had a good deal to do with the unsatisfactory character of these relations. I would suggest the formation of a vigilance league or committee the duty of which would be to read newspapers and books or pamphlets as they are published and to offer advice or admonition when and where necessary. The advice given will be private but in cases where it is disregarded public action will have to be taken in the shape of advice to the community at large to have nothing to do with the paper or the writer or the publisher concerned. The writer further exhorts Hindu organisations which exist in the province to take up the suggestion and give effect to it."

HINDUS IN JELLALABAD.

The Hindu population of the Jellalabad District have memorialised the Amir or the subject of their ill-treatment by their Mahomedan neighbours. They point out that during the reigns of Shere Ali, and Abdul Rahman, they were in no way neglected but that of late year certain Mullahs and officials have stirred up fanatical feelings against them. They ask that the Amir will personally enquire into the matter during his stay at Jellalabad as otherwise they will be unable to remain in the country.

THE BOMB AT AMBALLA.

Further particulars received about the police raids at Amballa, show that the houses searched were in the Umballa city as well as in the Cantonment, and it is reported, included those of Rai Sahib Murti Dhar, a pleader, who is styled as the grand old man of the Punjab, Pandit Madho Ram, a vakil, an old Congress man Mr. Lalla Duni Chand, pleader. Mr. Jamna Das, a merchant, Mr. Manohar Lal, a clerk in the Munsiff's Court, Mr. Deoki Nandan, a banker, Dr. S. G. Mukherji and Mr. Alakh Dhari, Secretary of the Upper India Glassworks. The Police, it is known, took with them a copy of the Bande Mataram newspaper, found in the house of Rai Sahib Munshi Dhar, and some books from the house of Mr. Madho Ram.

An Urdu daily of Lahore reports that it is rumoured that the bomb which was placed in the bungalow of the Deputy Commissioner was wrapped in an issue of the Hindustan newspaper of 17th December, published in Lahore. It is further reported that the Police is trying to secure that particular issue of the "Hindustan" from its subscribers in Umballa.

A local paper reports that in connection with the Amballa bomb outrage two Bengalees were arrested from Kalibari, Lahore on Thursday afternoon. One of them is an old man of 70 years. He is a Sadhu and came to Lahore only recently from Amballa where he was seen a few days before the occurrence. Nothing incriminating was found on the man.

The news about the arrest of two Bengalis in Lahore in connection with the Amballa bomb incident has been confirmed. Both the accused are Sadhus who reside at Rishikesh in Hardwar and are master musicians.

STEAMER ON FIRE.

A fire which has resulted in considerable damage to a vessel broke out on board the ss. "Aka" on Thursday evening last about 7 o'clock, while the vessel, proceeding to Khulna from Barisal, and owned by the River Steam Navigation Co., was passing Chagaldah Landing Station. Information was sent to Messrs. Macneil and Co., the Agents in Calcutta and Mr. Roy, the agent at Barisal, immediately left Calcutta and informed on has so far been received as to the cause of the fire, the damage done to the vessel, or loss of life, if any. An "Indian Daily News" representative on Sunday afternoon interviewing Mr. Taylor, the manager of the Shipping Department of Macneil and Co. learnt that no information had reached him since Saturday. Mr. Taylor could not say what cargo the boat was carrying besides the mails at the time; neither could he say how or under what circumstances the fire originated or if the mail bags had been saved. The telegram which had been received by the agents went to show that there was no definite news of loss of life up to the time of wiring. It is, however, surmised from the nature of the fire, that the vessel must have been considerably damaged. The whole of the machinery fittings are totally destroyed. The vessel is now on its way to Calcutta under tow, and is expected in the Hooghly on Wednesday afternoon.

A Barisal correspondent telegraphs to the "Bengalee" :—An accident of a rather serious type happened on the 6th instant when the mail steamer "Aka" plying between Barisal and Khulna caught fire between stations Sachida and Alaipur at about 6-30 p.m. There were about 150 to 200 passengers on board, including some women. Babu Bepin Behari Das, Pleader, Barisal, who came from Calcutta via Khulna next morning by the mail steamer "Manipuri" which was detained for about three hours at the place of occurrence for completely putting out the fire, took down the statements of some of the passengers of the "Aka" who happened to be still there together with the mail guard and the butler of the "Aka." The butler said :—A passenger was sitting near the jute bales close to the mail cabin with a lighted hurricane. It was about 5-30 p.m. and it grew dark when the steamer received a shock and the hurricane lantern tumbled down and broke. Then the jute caught fire. I was on the upper deck when I saw a furious fire had broken out in the lower deck, I jumped into the water from the upper deck. There were nearly 150 passengers. There has been loss of life but I cannot say how many died. I had 180 rupees in my box and articles worth Rs. 50 and all that is gone.

A Khulna correspondent wires to the same paper :—The mail bags were burnt to ashes. Babu Sita Nath Sen, Inspector of Police, Khulna, was a passenger; and he narrowly escaped by jumping into the water. According to him the total number of passengers was about two hundred, of which one-third died, burnt or drowned. A blind gentleman in a cabin going to Calcutta for treatment is missing. A Christian lady jumped into the water with her dress and shoes on and escaped. Police investigation is proceeding.

Further details received by the River Steam Navigation Company in Calcutta about the fire on board the "Aka" go to show that owing to the confusion at the time the passenger who dropped the hurricane lamp was lost sight of, but his identity, it is believed, will be established shortly. A panic reigned among the passengers at the time and to avoid further disaster the serang promptly ran the boat on to the bank of the river. Most of the passengers were got off without much difficulty. While many of them jumped into the river and swam ashore. Of the latter one, a man, died on shore from exhaustion. So far this is the only casualty.

HALDIBARI DACOITY.

Information had been received by the Bengal Police that three men named Nitto Gopal Mukerjee, Bina Prantik and Kanye Das, who were alleged to be implicated in the Haldibari Dacoity had absconded to Calcutta. These three men suddenly disappeared from their native village in the Jessore District. The local Police obtained information that they were putting up in the house of Surruth Chandra Mukerjee at No. 61-2, Nimtollah 1st Lane who is the brother of the first accused. The Police obtained a warrant and assisted by Inspectors Mulcahy and Pandit, searched Surruth Chunder Mukerjee's house on the 4th instant but found that the three accused had again absconded. It was since ascertained that the accused left Calcutta on Monday night by the Goalundo mail but to which place they have now proceeded the Police were unable to discover. A thorough search was made in the room of Surruth Babu with the result that sundry letters, post cards and books were seized.

NEWS.

PATIALA TRIAL.

The Special Tribunal, composed of Sardar Bhagwan Singh, Lalla Ramprasad and Khan Bahadur Fazil Matin, assembled to-day when the Patiala case was taken up. Mr. Grey resumed his address on behalf of the prosecution, the first couple of hours being spent in trying to prove that the Arya Samaj was a political body and politics was an integral part of their activities. He first dealt with the alleged foul epithets used by Swami Dyanand against all religions other than that of the Aryas. He quoted several passages against the Christian divinity and in this connection asked if it was surprising that the Arya had so many enemies as they complained Counsel quoted from Mr. Lajpat Rai's writing in his introduction to the "Life of Mazzini" to the effect that it was unnatural for the nation to remain under another nation. Foreign yoke was tolerated by people under very strong compulsion and if the English had not come to India it would not be surprising that the Hindus would have gained possession of all India. There had been no instance in the history of India when the Hindus had not drawn their swords to gain the independence. After quoting several other passages from the utterances of the prominent members of Arya Samaj, Mr. Grey said that that was clear proof that the Arya Samaj was a political body.

On behalf of the members and sympathisers of the Arya Samaj of Rawalpindi, Mr. Hakumat Rai, Secretary of the Arya Samaj, Rawalpindi, has circulated the following disclaimer:—The Arya Samaj places it on record that the imputations and accusations embodied in the criminal complaint of Crown "versus" Jawala Parshad and others filed at Patiala and in the opening speech of Mr. Grey, Counsel for the prosecution in that case against the Arya Samaj in particular and entirely baseless and untrue. The Society was neither founded nor ever engaged nor was it ever conducted for the purpose of any political propaganda nor for the object of spreading disloyalty and disaffection in British India and the Native states as is alleged. On the other hand the Arya Samaj, which has always consisted of the loyal subjects of the British Crown, was founded and has existed and has been managed and conducted solely for carrying on religious and social reform throughout this country and elsewhere. That a copy of this resolution be submitted to the Local Government through the Deputy Commissioner of the District and to the All-India Arya League and the provincial representative bodies of the Arya Samaj."

TRIAL OF KISHEN SINGHA.

In the trial of Kishen Singh, one of the accused in the Lahore sedition cases, who filed the names of important persons to be summoned as defence witnesses, the Court decided that a responsible Magistrate of Calcutta be commissioned to record the statements of Mr. Gokhale, Dr. Rashbehari Ghose and Mr. Surendranath Banerjee, a Poona Magistrate to examine Mr. Kelkar, a Madras Officer to take Mr. Natesan's deposition and a Bombay Magistrate to record the statement of the Editor of the "Indu Prakash." Directions were also sent to the District Magistrate of Rawalpindi to examine Mr. Alfred Nundy, and the Magistrate of Lucknow to record Mr. Ganga Porshad Varma's statement. These gentlemen are witnesses in the case against the book "Hindustan me Angrezi Hakumat" i. e. "British rule in India," which purports to be a translation of Mr. Jennings Bryan's articles on the administration of India.

The accused Lalchand further desired that the Bishop of Lahore be subpoenaed in order to give evidence in the case of the book "Bagi Messhi," i. e. "Christ in India." It was decided to issue a commission to send a Magistrate to record the statement of the Bishop of Lahore. The accused also wanted to subpoena the Chief Secretary to the Local Government and the Secretary to Government and the Secretary to Government of India to elicit further information and know whether his prosecution was based on the whole writing or on an extract. His prayer was refused.

Kishen Sing prayed also to subpoena Sir Pratap Chandra Chatterjee which was granted.

At this stage Mr. Potman, Government Advocate, produced a telegram from Dr. Rashbehari Ghose saying that at the time of publication of the book "British Rule in India," he was not a member of the British Committee of the Congress.

Mr. Lajpat Rai in his first letter to Parmanand, after discussing internal matters of the Arya Samaj said, that he had practically retired from the Arya Samaj and did not take any active part in the Samaj or D. A. V. College. Next he referred to and said that the "Punjabee" case had brought about more change in the country which ten years of agitation could not have done, but students behaved most rudely. The European community was in panic. Lajpat Rai then said that since the Editor and Proprietor of the "Punjabee" had gone to jail, the responsibility of conducting the paper rested on him. He asked Parmanand to send him one book at least each month dealing with politics, no matter of what character. In the end Lajpat Rai asked Parmanand whether he had shifted from the India house of Shyamaji Krishna Varma, and if so, why he expressed a hope that good literature will be placed in the hand of our boys. He asked what was the effect of the "Punjabee" case in England and closed with compliments to Shyamaji Krishna Varma. In the second letter to Parmanand, Lajpat Rai said that the matter had gone from bad to worse; people were sullen and morose and even agricultural classes had begun agitating, but he was afraid lest the bursting out might be premature.

ANARCHICAL LETTERS AND PAMPHLET IN LAHORE.

It is stated that a number of letters dealing with anarchical crimes and incitements to violence have been received in Lahore by the last English Mail. These include a printed pamphlet of two sheets styled "Talwar" reawakened with a miniature picture of Madanlal Dhingra on it. The pamphlet is reported to have been printed in Berlin. The Government of India have already prescribed the paper from coming into India.

DACCA STABBING CASE.

Jogesh Rout and Surendra Majumdar, "alias" Bocha, accused in the Anantnagar case, have been discharged by the Additional Magistrate, the proceedings against two other accused arrested later being left at the disposal of the Crown.

A COUNCIL OF THE RAILWAY POLICE
 (On the 6th January the Railway Police with the help of the local C. I. D. arrested one Dhanata Das a student of the second year class, Dacca College, in college premises, in presence of P. H. Archibald. The arrest was in connection with the Stripur running train dacoity case. The Binapani mess attached to the Dacca College where the above student lived was searched by the C. I. D. Inspector Atul Chandra and the Railway Police Sub-Inspector Haridas Bose, under the guidance of the senior Deputy Magistrate Mr. Girindra Banerjee, Mr. Archibald was present during the latter part of the search. Nothing was taken by the police except a copy of a diary of a boarder of the mess.

THE EDITOR OF THE "SAHAYAK."
 Munshiram Editor of the Sahayak newspaper, against whom an arrest warrant had been issued, surrendered himself before the Deputy Commissioner of Gurudaspur on the 4th instant. He was taken in custody and sent to Lahore.

AN ACCUSED ACQUITTED.
 The Tilak newspaper, published at Hoshiarpur, was confiscated by Government some time back, and its Editor Bhagat Singh, got five years on two counts for possessing moulds to prepare counterfeit coins. The Chief Court acquitted the accused on Monday.

THE HEARING OF THE GOVERNMENT ADVOCATE
 The hearing of the Government Advocate against Lalchand Falak, the accused, was taken up. The Government Advocate stated on oath, "I have been authorised by the Punjab Government to file a complaint against Lalchand. One Ajit Singh, now absconding compiled a book Hindustan me Angrez ki Hakumat (British rule in India) and got it printed in the "Hindustan" steam press. The book was sold by Lalchand Falak and is an Urdu translation of a pamphlet entitled "British Rule in India" on whose cover it is mentioned that it was published by the London British Congress Committee and was a reprint from "India." Though Ajit Singh was mentioned as the writer of the book, was really written by Mr. Bryan, a candidate for the United States Presidency. British administration of justice had been brought into hatred in the book. It was prayed by the Government that Lalchand be prosecuted under section 124A.

Cross-examined by the accused the Government Advocate said that he did not know in the importation into India of American newspapers was prohibited. He had no knowledge about the "Sun" newspaper of America.

After recording some evidence, the Court framed charges against the accused to which the accused pleaded 'not guilty.'

THE

Cheap Edition of KARMAYOGIN.

The difficulty felt by many students and educated men of small means in buying the KARMAYOGIN at its ordinary price of two annas, has been so much pressed on our attention that we have found it necessary to bring out a cheaper edition at one anna a copy. It is not an easy thing in this country to establish a weekly review of this standard written in English, and it has therefore been necessary for us at the outset to place a price on the paper which should ensure its being self-supporting even with a limited circulation. The KARMAYOGIN, however, is now sufficiently successful to allow of a concession of this kind being made without financial injury. The subscribers to the superior edition will be compensated by the superior get-up and paper, while the cheaper edition will remove the grievance of the large number who have hitherto been debarred from reading the review by their scanty means.

FACTS AND OPINIONS.

Lajpatrai's Letters.

The case of Paramanand, the Arya Samaj teacher, whom with a singular pusillanimity the D. A. V. College authorities have dismissed before anything was proved against him, has been of more than usual interest because of the parade with which Lajpatrai's letters to him were brought forward. The letters were innocent enough on the face of them, but prejudice and suspicion were deliberately manufactured out of the connection with Krishnavarma, the expression "revolutionary" the use of the word "boys," and an anticipation of the agrarian outbreak in connection with the Punjab Government's ill-advised Land legislation. The bubble has been speedily pricked by the simple statement of facts in the Punjabee and by Lajpatrai's own evidence. That Lajpatrai was acquainted with Shyamji Krishnavarma when he was in England, was known already; so were many men who worked with him, Sir Henry Cotton among others, when he was only an enthusiastic Home Ruler and violently opposed to violence. The project of a Nationalist League of India Society well equipped with a library and other appointments for political education was well advanced, and active in the same country previous to the first deportations. The anticipation of the agrarian outbreak in the letter expresses an apprehension, not a desire, and merely shows that Lajpatrai was uneasy at the rate at which the discontent was swelling and feared that it might lead to an outbreak prematurely forestalling the use of a peaceful pressure on the Government. It is remarkable how throughout his career the honesty and consistency of Lala Lajpatrai's adherence to a peaceful but strenuous Nationalism has been vindicated at every step, and this last revelation of his private and even secret letters is an ordeal of fire out of which he has triumphantly emerged with his consistency and his innocence wholly established.

A Nervous Samaj.

It is with great regret that we find ourselves compelled to enlarge on the hint we gave in our last issue, and comment adversely on the methods by which the Arya Samaj is attempting to save itself from the displeasure of the Government. It is well that it should have disclaimed sedition and repudiated the charge of being not a religious but a political body. But to run nervously to all and sundry for a testimonial of respectability, to sue for a certificate of loyalty to the Lieutenant-Governor of the Punjab and express gratitude for an un-gracious, ambiguous and minatory letter of reply, to prejudge by dismissal a man whose guilt has yet to be proved, are actions which show that Swami Dayananda's religion may have emancipated the intellects of the leading Samajists but has done little to elevate their character. We must also express our amazement at the action of the Samaj in accepting the resignation by Lala Lajpatrai of his offices on the various governing bodies of the Samaj. There are two men who are the glory of the Samaj and by whose adherence and prominence it commands the respect and admiration of all India, Lala Lajpatrai and Lala Munshiram. By its action with regard to the former, the Samaj will lose heavily, it has already lost heavily, in public estimation. In his generous anxiety for the body to which he has devoted the greater part of his life-work, Lala Lajpatrai offered to it the chance of freeing itself from the attacks its enemies founded upon his connection with it. It was an offer which he was bound to make, but the Samaj ought to have refused. Lajpatrai's only offence is that he has worked and suffered for his country. By its action the Samaj has announced to the whole world that no man must dare to feel and act, however blamelessly, for his country if he wishes to be recognised by the Samaj. If so, Aryaism will perish from the face of India and leave no trace behind. The world has no use any longer for religious bodies which exclude courage, manliness, generosity, justice and patriotism from their moral practice. The Banerji Vigilance Committees.

The novel departure initiated by the fertile mind of Srijut Surendranath Banerji at Barrackpur in the creation of Vigilance Committees to check the nocturnal lovers of bomb and bullet practice on the E.B.S.R. has created great interest and amusement among his countrymen. There are many who are ungenerous enough to attribute this anti-Anarchical zeal less to loyalty and a noble "co-operative" instinct than to the fact that our great leader has himself to travel daily over the zone of danger. Even if it were so, the sneer is ungenerous. We all love our lives, we have all to travel occasionally by the E.B.S.R. in first or second class and we cannot ignore the fact that random bullets and explosive cocoanuts are not respecters of persons and, if they find the head even of a Nationalist leader in the way, will not be polite enough to walk round it. We shall all therefore be grateful to our old man eloquent, if he can ensure our common safety. But for ourselves, we do not see how he can effect his laudable object. It would be possible for Srijut Surendranath and the other estimable bourgeois of Barrackpur to patrol the railway at night, but the weather is still cold, sleep is pleasant, bullets and cocoanuts perilous missiles, and, if anything happens, the police are quite capable of suspecting and arresting the too vigilant patrons of the public peace. One might revive the "National Volunteers" for the purpose; but the Samities are disbanded, students forbidden to take part in politics or do anything that would interfere with their studies. They are not likely to be enthusiastic for this kind of volunteer work under these conditions. And, if such organizations were created, it would be more likely to alarm than gratify a suspicious and nervous Government which might see in it a disingenuous device for reviving the proclaimed Samities. The only other resource is for these novel vigilance men to turn detectives, discover the Terrorists and give information to the police, which they can only do by becoming agent provocateurs and so worming themselves into the confidence of their quarry. That is, a kind of dirty work no Indian gentleman is likely to undertake even with the prospect of vindicating his loyalty, escaping house-searches and deportation and earning the encomiums of the Englishman.

Postal Precautions.

Sj. Aurobindo Ghose has recently received an anonymous letter giving him the momentous information that a certain Gopal Chandra Ray of the C. I. D. with several assistants is busy watching 6 College Square and the Post Office and copying all the letters and post-cards that come in his name without exception. Sj. Aurobindo has not the honour of the noble Gopal's acquaintance, nor is he even aware whether this gentleman has any corporeal existence. The letter may be a hoax; or it may be sent by one of the "assistants," weary to death of copying letters and post-cards and of the inelegant and uncomfortable business of an open air watch fanned by the breezes of Goldighi in this season. It does not matter to the gentleman honoured by these attentions whether the whole police force occupy Goldighi for inquisitorial purposes or whether numerous editions of his correspondence are turned out for the use of posterity by the disinterested labours of the C. I. D. Still, he has suggested to us certain proposals to be placed before the Government in this connection and we proceed to make them. In the first place, for the sake of humanity, a comfortable stall might be put up in the Square for the vigilant cow-keeper and his herd whence they could watch more happily and quite as effectively. Secondly, if the Government would kindly instruct the Post Office not to lose one-tenth of Aurobindo Babu's letters after copying them and delay the greater part of the others, there would probably be no harm done to the Empire. Thirdly, Sj. Aurobindo Ghose begs us to inform the authorities that he was never greatly in the habit of writing letters before and, after the exposure of his private correspondence with his friends and family by the prosecution in the Alipur case, he has almost dropped the practice, except in urgent matters of business.

It is possible, therefore, for this part of the investigation to be carried on very cheaply, and the Government must not be deceived by any representations on part of Gopal or others that a big staff is wanted. Further, we are instructed to inform all intending correspondents of the above-mentioned facts so that they may not be disturbed or anxious about Sj. Aurobindo's health if they get no answer to their letters. Secondly, it would be advisable for them, when writing to him, to forward a copy of the letter to the Secretary to the Bengal Government or to Mr. Denham of the C. I. D. Thirdly, if any one wishes to send by post specimens of bombs, revolvers, or anything explosive or pifric, or plans and estimates for a conspiracy or insurrection great or small, he had better send it either by hand or through the editors of the Statesman or Englishman. No reply need be expected.

Detective Wiles.

While we are on this subject, we might suggest to the C. I. D. to train up a few spies and informers, send them for the completion of their education to France and then appoint them as teachers in the College in India. Just now they do their work very clumsily. We may instance the case of an Eurasian or European gentleman rejoicing in an Irish name or alias and a false address, who left his card on Sj. Aurobindo Ghose and then opened fire with a letter requesting the loan of a revolver, brand new and serviceable, without which the Irish gentleman could not live any longer. Neither is it a good opening for acquaintance to come for financial help to a man known to be himself the possessor of a very small income. To request advice how to serve the country or to become religious is a more plausible opening, but it ought to be followed up and sustained plausibly. Even the wearing of the saffron robe need not be a passport to effusive friendship, unless there is something behind, and not always even then. We may also refer to the romantic story of the Dead Letter Office recently published the other day by Sj. Prabhachandra Deb in the Hitabadi. This precious script was curiously enough addressed to Grey Street, without any number, in Prabhas Babu's handwriting.

and with his signature so exactly reproduced as to defy discrimination even by an expert. As both Prabhas Babu and the police are well aware that there is now no connection between Sj. Aurobindo and any number in Grey Street, it was obviously the writer's intention that it should go to the Dead Letter Office and from there to the C. I. D. Prabhas Babu's suggestion was not, as the Hitabadi reported, to send it to the Calcutta Police for inquiry, but to return it to the Dead Letter Office. Sj. Aurobindo preferred to consign it to the waste paper basket as a more fitting repository. We cannot imagine any earthly use for these clumsy devices. Even Mr. Norton would find it difficult to make anything of a forgery, however exact, more hopelessly suspicious even than the "sweets" letter.

THE NEW POLICY.

A policy of conciliation, a policy of trust in the people, a policy liberal, progressive, sure if slow,—that was the forecast made by the Moderate astrologers when the Reform comet sailed into our startled heavens. The prophets and augurs of the Anglo-Indian Press friendly to Moderate India—friendly on condition of our giving up all aspirations that go beyond the Reforms—prophesied high, loud and often to the same purpose, and if, like the Roman augurs, they winked and smiled mysteriously at each other when they met, the outside world was not supposed to know anything of their private opinions. Even the disillusionment caused by the publication of the Councils Rules has not prevented this party of wise and able politicians from supporting by participation the Reforms which they condemned, and belauding the intention of the Anglo-Indian reformers while swearing dismally and violently at their practice. Bad as it is, we must cooperate so as to make the best of the new measure. To make the best of a bad measure is to make it a success and so prevent or delay the coming of a better. This at least is our idea of the matter, but we belong to a party not of wise and able politicians who take the full profit of that which they condemn as disastrous and injurious, but of men who have the misfortune still to believe in logic, principle and experience. To be logical is to be a mere theorist, to cling to principle is to be a doctrinaire and to be guided by experience, the world's and our own, is to be impractical. Only those whose theory is confused and practice self-contradictory and haphazard, can be wise politicians and capable of guiding the country aright. From this standpoint the proclamation of all India as seditious is, doubtless, the first step in the new policy, the policy of conciliation and liberalism. It is the sign-manual of the great reformer, Lord Morley, upon his work, the loud-tongued harbinger of the golden Age.

No particular motive can be alleged for this sudden proclamation, nor is any alleged. The people are left to speculate in the dark as to the mystic motives of Lords Minto and Morley in this remarkable step forward, or to get what light and comfort they can from the speculations of our Anglo-Indian friends and advisers, who seem to be as much in the dark as ourselves and can only profess their blind religious faith in the necessity and beneficence of the measure and appeal to all patriotic Indians to cooperate in coercing the national movement into silence. If India had been full of meetings of a seditious or doubtful nature, the necessity of the measure could have been established. Even if the national life were pulsating swiftly though blamelessly, its "aetiology",—if we may use a word which may possibly be condemned by Mr. Petman or Mr. Grey as seditious,—could have been understood, though not its necessity. But at present, with the exception of an occasional scantily attended meeting in the Calcutta squares, the only political meetings held are those in which abhorrence of Terrorism is expressed or Vigilance Committees of leading citizens organized to patrol the E.B.S.R. at night even in this chilly weather, and those in which the Deccan Sabha drinks deep of the political sermons and homilies of Lord Morley's personal friend, Mr. Gokhale. Was it to stop these that the proclamation of all India became necessary?

It has been freely alleged that the prevalence of bombs and Terrorism in Bombay, Punjab and Bengal is the justification of the measure, on the ground that open sedition leads to secret assassination, Nationalism to Terrorism. It is obvious that to attempt to meet secret conspiracy by prohibiting public agitation is a remedy open to the charge of absurdity. The secret conspirator rejoices in silence, the Terrorist find his opportunity in darkness. Is not the liberty of free speech and free writing denied to the Russian people by more rigorous penalties, a more effective espionage, a far more absolute police rule than any that can be attempted in India? Yet where do the bomb and the revolver, the Terrorist and the secret conspirator flourish more than in Russia? The conspirator has his own means of propaganda which the law finds it difficult to touch. The argument, however, is that it is only in an atmosphere of dissatisfaction, disaffection and sedition that the propaganda of the conspirator can be effective, and Nationalism creates that atmosphere. Criticism of the Government leads to dissatisfaction with the Government, dissatisfaction leads to the aspiration for a better form of Government, aspiration of this kind when balked leads to disaffection, disaffection leads to secret conspiracy and assassination. Therefore stop all means of criticising the Government and the first cause being removed, the final effect will disappear. That this is the actual train of reasoning, conscious or unconscious, in the minds of those who advise, initiate or approve a policy of repression is beyond doubt. It is evident in all they say or write.

Unfortunately the statement of the premises in this chain is incomplete and the conclusion is therefore vitiated. The first premise may be granted at once. In a country well satisfied with its lot, a nation at ease and aware of prosperity and progress, the propaganda of the secret conspirator must necessarily fail. In India itself, if we are to believe the Times, secret societies have existed for upwards of forty or fifty years. How is it that they had no success and no one was aware of their existence?

until the reaction after Lord Ripon's regime culminated in the viceroyalty of Lord Curzon? Dissatisfaction is not created by public criticism, it is created by the adverse facts on which public criticism fastens, and it crystallises either in public criticism or in secret discontent. The public criticism creates public agitation, the secret discontent creates secret conspiracy. Both are born of the same circumstances, but the lines of development are entirely different, nor is there much sympathy between them. The public agitator dreads the secret conspirator the secret conspirator despises the public agitator, even when they are moving towards the same end. The man most detested and denounced by the Indian revolutionary organisations now active at Paris, Geneva and Berlin, is Sri Bipin Chandra Pal, the prophet and first preacher of passive resistance. Yet the object of both is almost identical, the Nationalist agitator insisting on perfect autonomy, the revolutionist on separation, both being merely different forms of independence. The question for the authorities is whether they will try to ignore or silence the public criticism or remove the cause of dissatisfaction. If they ignore without silencing public criticism, the dissatisfaction grows in volume until it becomes the aspiration for a better form of Government. They must then either satisfy that aspiration or silence it, they can no longer ignore it. This game of ignoring the obvious is, like the first crude attempt of Nationalism in India to ignore the Government, foredoomed to failure; it only postpones and intensifies the problem, it does not get rid of it. Yet this was the policy long followed by the Indian Government towards the Congress movement. On the other hand, they may silence the public criticism or trample on it. If they trample on it, the aspiration becomes dissatisfaction not necessarily to the sovereign, but to the form and system of Government then obtaining, with a cry for absolute transformation. This was what happened in India in 1905. Trampling on public opinion without silencing its expression is mere madness; it leads to the genesis of great revolutionary movements, injures the Government, endangers public peace and order, and helps nobody. This method does not even postpone the necessity of a solution, it hastens it by intensifying the problem to breaking-point. Yet this was the policy of Lord Curzon. He not only permitted the expression of public discontent, but he fostered it by arguing with and trying to persuade it; yet he invariably trampled on the thing he permitted. It is statesmanship of this kind which ruins empires and destroys great nations. There is another kind of policy, and that is to play with the monster of discontent, to chide it, whip it and yet throw it sops while taking advantage of the monster's preoccupation with the sop to wind the chain round its neck tighter and tighter. This is also bad policy. The whip enrages, the sop does not soothe but irritates, the tightening of the chain only shortens the distance between the tamer and the brute;—for the difficulty is that, the tamer has to hold the chain, he cannot tie it to something else and get out of springing distance.

Eventually, either discontent has to be satisfied or silenced. If it is satisfied, the whole difficulty disappears and perfectly amicable relations are restored. That was the policy pursued by England with regard to its colonies after the severe lesson learned in America, with the result that the bond between the colonies and Great Britain still defies the efforts of Time and Circumstance to loosen or snap them. But if discontent is not to be satisfied, the question then for the ruler is whether he prefers it to crystallize in public agitation and peaceful but possibly effective resistance, or in secret conspiracy, terrorism and eventually armed insurrection. It must be one of the two, for to expect an immense impulse like the national impulse to sink to rest without being either crushed or satisfied, is to expect impossible miracles. The Anglo-Indian appeal to the political leaders to be satisfied and cease from agitation is a singularly foolish and futile one. If the political leaders were to comply, even the most popular and trusted of them, they would cease to be leaders the next day. The dwindling numbers that attend the Convention meetings are a signal proof of this very obvious fact; that diminution has been effected, it must be remembered without public agitation, without any organisation or activity of the Nationalist party, by the mere operation of a law of Nature. The aspiration, however created, is there and it is a fire mounting out of the bowels of the earth, which no man's hand can extinguish. The political leaders know that they cannot quench it, if they would; the Government thinks it can. And the method it seems to favour, if the extension of the Seditious Meetings Act and the prosecutions of papers and publications or their leaders all over India are any sign, is to silence public criticism.

If our view of the question is right, it is evident that to paralyse public agitation is to foster Terrorism, and we can only suppose that Government think Terrorism easier to deal with than public agitation. This seems to us a grievous error. If experience shows anything, it is that Terrorism is never extinguished except by the removal of its causes. The difference between Terrorism and open rebellion is that open rebellion often effects its object, but can easily be crushed, while Terrorism does not effect its object, but cannot be crushed. The only thing that Terrorism can do is to compel Government to satisfy partially the more moderate demands of peaceful agitation as the lesser of two evils, and this is a result which the Terrorist looks on with contempt. He is always extreme and fanatical and will not be satisfied with any thing less than immediate freedom gained by violence. He is confident of his result, he is passionately and intolerantly attached to his method. Irish Terrorism only disappeared because of the expectation of Home Rule by the alliance with British Liberalism; Russian Terrorism is still kept alive by the impotence of the Duma; Anarchism flourishes because the Governments of Europe have not found any way of circumventing it. Terrorism may perish of inanition; coercion is its food and its fuel.

The policy now being followed by Lord Minto's Government has neither immediate justification nor ultimate wisdom. It is the old futile round which reluctant authority has always trod when unable to reconcile itself to inevitable concession. It is a wasteful ruinous and futile process. For if the Government were to declare tomorrow that it would no longer tolerate public opposition and deport all the leaders of public and peaceful agitation in the country, it would only stimulate more formidable and unscrupulous forces and substitute a violent, dangerous and agonizing process for one which, even if a little painful, is helpful, economical and constructive.

THOUGHTS AND COMMENTS.

Nationalism and Nationalists.

The Mazzinian Creed, upon which the whole philosophy of nationalism of the Young Italy School was based, may be briefly summed up as faith (1) in God, (2) in Law, (3) in Humanity, and (4) in Association. The French Revolution was essentially lacking in the sense of the Unseen. What is known as the God-idea found no place in the dominant thought of the French Illumination. While it tried in its own way to arrive at some sort of a social synthesis, seeking to discover a new principle of the social life, it almost entirely neglected the religious factor which had hitherto formed the basis of that life. To the authors of the French Revolution, religion meant a supernatural scripture and an infallible Pope, crippling and killing the freedom of thought and speculation of the individual; a priesthood, dominating the social and personal activities of the individual and oftentimes allied to the political autocracy on the one side, which denied the individual his rights of free citizenship, and with the aristocracy on the other, which kept him out of his legitimate share of the fruits of his own labour and his rightful participation in the general economic life of his country and nation. Swayed by the inevitable passions and prejudices of turbulent revolutionary times, they were almost physically incapacitated from differentiating the real from the mere formal elements of the religious life, and thereby discarding the current errors of that life without denying or destroying the eternal verities that underlie it and from association with which alone do even religious errors and superstitions derive their sanction and authority. Indeed, if anything, the authors of the French Revolution themselves, when they realised the need of a religious impulse to awaken and keep up the enthusiasm of the populace in the new order they established in the country,—set up a travesty of the old and discarded religious forms and ceremonies, to symbolise the new faith and philosophy which they preached, and called the new cult the religion of humanity. Mazzini saw that neither pure individualism, nor humanitarianism, nor the two combined, one supplementing the other, can supply the basis of a rational synthesis. A synthesis means always the harmony of parts in a perfected whole. The conception of this perfected whole was practically wanting in the philosophy of the French Revolution. This was a fatal weakness, which really foredoomed the whole movement to failure, its lofty idealism notwithstanding. Mazzini fully recognised it. But the recognition of it did not drive him back to Catholicism, nor even to Christianity, as popularly understood; that would have meant a mere reaction. And a reaction is never a real synthesis, though it may help a synthesis by bringing out its need, and, perhaps, even to some extent indicating the fundamental lines along which it must be worked out. Mazzini did not go back to the old formulas and symbols of religion, but simply took up the eternal fact which they all tried to represent. That eternal fact of man's religious experience is expressed universally by the term God. In his conception of the Divine Unity, Mazzini sought and found the key to that higher synthesis which he proclaimed in Europe.

The gospel of the French Revolution had proclaimed one Law for all. Liberty, Equality, Fraternity, are meaningless terms if there be no law. Law is the principle of association upon which all these are based. There can be neither liberty nor equality nor fraternity in real anarchism or a state of absolute lawlessness. But what is law? Law really means a relation, either actual or ideal. And a relation implies two or more factors of relation and a principle of relation which combines them, and, by so doing, makes the relation possible. This principle of relation must, on the face of it, be such as will include all the different factors of the relation, but which shall not be confined to any of the particular factors, nor shall be exhausted by them all collectively. In other words, the principle of relation must necessarily be a universal principle, on its own plane, in the series of factors which it controls and relates to one another. If this series be an infinite series, then the principle of relation here must be an absolutely universal principle. The universe is infinite. Man stands in this universe in the midst of an infinitude of relations. The principle of relation which makes the Law of the universe and the Law of humanity, must, of necessity, be a Universal Principle. It is this Universal Principle, pervading this "congeries of relations" which we call the universe, holding together the infinite factors of this system of relations, and yet transcending them all, severally and collectively both,—the basis of their existence, the source of their law,—it is this which Mazzini called God. This conception of the Godhead followed, directly and as of necessity, from the idea of Law upon which the gospel of the French Revolution was based. Thus, in reply to the question—Whence come you? In whose name do you preach!—Mazzini said:—

"We come in the name of God and Humanity.

We believe in one God; the author of all existence; the absolute living Thought, of whom our world is a ray, the universe an incarnation."

And as if to indicate the basis of his theism, he next declared his conception of Law:—

"We believe in a general, immutable law: a law which constitutes our mode of existence; embraces the whole series of possible phenomena; exercises a continuous action upon the universe and all therein comprehended, both in its physical and moral aspect."

But law has no meaning unless there is an aim to be reached. No relation is really stationary. And the perpetually moving nature of phenomena can only be understood and rationally interpreted on the hypothesis of some far-off end towards which they are moving. Mazzini recognizes this end, and his conception of Humanity, as the progressive interpreter of the Law and its necessary end, is based directly upon this recognition.

As every law assumes an aim to be reached, we believe in the progressive development of the faculties and forces—faculties in action—of all living things towards that unknown aim. Were this not so, the law would be useless, and existence unintelligible."

But is this aim really unknown? There can be no rational assumption of that which is absolutely unknown. Of the unknown you cannot say that it is, you cannot say that it is not. To say that the aim which the law assumes, is absolutely unknown, is to make over the governance of the universe to the hands of blind Fate, in which, then, man with all his intelligence and conscience, can have possibly no conscious and rational participation. The aim being absolutely unknown, the value of the law which seeks that aim would also be absolutely undetermined, and as such it would have no rational or ethical claim upon our allegiance. This aim is, therefore, really not unknown, but only partially and progressively known; and to the extent it is known, it commands rational and willing acceptance. The fact really is that this "aim" is not absolutely unknown, but only progressively revealed in the course of cosmic evolution. And, though Mazzini here speaks of an "unknown aim," it is only the progressive character of its revelation which he means to indicate by the term unknown. And a Law such as this, continually reaching out to a progressively revealed aim, demands, necessarily, an ever-present and progressive interpreter. Who is to be this Interpreter? Mazzini says—Humanity.

"Every law being interpreted and verified by its subject, we believe in Humanity,—the collective Being that sums up and comprehends the ascending series of organic creations; the most perfect manifestation of the thought of God upon our globe—as the sole interpreter of the law."

And like every other interpreter of laws, whether they be Popes interpreting the law of religion to Catholicism, or the Judiciary in our civilisation which interpret the civil Code in different countries, Humanity is also a progressive interpreter of the eternal Law of the universe. And Mazzini distinctly indicated the progressive character of this interpretation. This was, to him, the key of human progress and development.

We believe that harmony between the subject and the law being the condition of all normal existence, the known and immediate object of all endeavour is the establishment of this harmony in ever-increasing completeness and security, through the gradual discovery and comprehension of the law and identification of its subject with it.

But God, Law, and even Humanity, were not really terms of the new synthesis which Mazzini tried to work out. These are all, in some sense or other, what he would perhaps call "the terms of the anterior synthesis." The specifically new term of his own synthesis was Association. It was by this that he separated himself from the "epoch of exclusive individuality." It was in this that he found "a new basis to the principle of universal suffrage," and was, thus, able to elevate "the political question to the height of a philosophical conception."

Upon this, finally, he based his whole philosophy of Nationalism. In this declaration of faith, from which I have been quoting, he said:—

"We believe in Association, which is but the reduction to action of our faith in one sole God, and one sole aim,—as the only means we possess of realising the truth; as the method of progress; the path leading towards perfection. The highest possible degree of human progress will correspond to the discovery and application of the vastest possible formula of association."

And in what we would call the universal federation of humanity, but what Mazzini called the Holy Alliance of Peoples, he discovered this highest formula of association; and from this he deduced his creed of nationality. We believe, he declared,—

"in the Holy Alliance of Peoples as being the vastest formula of association possible in our epoch;—in the liberty and equality of the peoples, without which no true association can exist;—in nationality which is the conscience of the peoples, and which, by assigning to them their part in the work of association, their mission upon earth, that is to say, their individuality; without which neither liberty nor equality are possible;—in the sacred Fatherland, the cradle of nationality; altar and workshop of the individuals of which each people is composed. As liberty and equality are the fundamental principles of association, in the Holy Alliance of Peoples, so they are also in the secondary association of individuals composing the different peoples."

"As we believe in the liberty and equality of the peoples, so do we believe in the liberty and equality of the men (and he must have meant of the women also) of every people, and in the inviolability of the human Ego, which is the conscience of the individual and assigns to him his part in the secondary association; his function in the nation, his special mission of citizenship within the sphere of the Fatherland."

And as we believe in Humanity as the sole interpreter of the law of God, so do we believe in the people of every state as the sole master, sole sovereign, and sole interpreter of the law of Humanity, which governs every national mission. We believe in the people, one and indivisible; recognising neither castes nor privileges, save those of genius and virtue; neither proletariat nor aristocracy, whether landed or financial, but simply an aggregate of faculties and forces consecrated to the wellbeing of all, to the administration of the common substance and possession, the terrestrial globe. We believe in the people; one and independent; so organised as to harmonise the individual faculties with the social idea; living by the fruits of its own labour, united in seeking after the greatest possible amount of general wellbeing, and in respect for the rights of individuals.

This was Mazzini's message to his time. "God and his law; Humanity and its work of interpretation, progress, association, liberty, and equality; these with the dogma of the People"—formed the principal contents of his message. These are essentially the contents of our message also. The terms are practically the same, only they have, perhaps, a deeper meaning to us, especially of India, than what they had even to Mazzini. This does not take away, however, from the greatness of his genius or the grandeur of his vision; but only means that that progressive development of the race which he regarded as the very soul and essence of the Law that governed all living things, has not been arrested during the three quarters of a century which cover the period between 1835 and 1910.

PATIALA SEDITION.

STATEMENT ON ARYA SAMAJ.

On the 11th of October the news was flashed across the wires that a large number of Arya Samajists had been suddenly arrested at Patiala on charges of sedition and seditious libel (i.e. of offences under sections 124A and 124B of the Indian Penal Code) and that their houses were being searched. The news convulsed the entire public of the Panjab with commotion. For several days it was impossible to say how far the sensational news which was going the round of the Press was correct, every paper published a story of its own, some Anglo-Indian papers fixed the number of arrests at several hundred others putting it below one hundred, some even saying that among those arrested were a large number of students, one or two Moslems and a few Sikhs. Similar discrepancies existed as to the origin (and causes) of these arrests and searches. All doubts were removed and all uncertainty was set at rest when an authentic account of the arrests appeared in the Dunjabee. It embodied the result of the enquiry of Mr. Roshan Lal, Bar-at-Law, who had been deputed by the friends of the principal accused to go to Patiala and ascertain the true facts. The net result of his enquiry, which may be accepted as true may be thus briefly summarised:—

1. That for sometime past it had been rumoured that the State Council was anxious to dispense with the services of Mr. Warburton, a retired officer of the Panjab Police who combined in his person the offices of the Inspector-General of Police, the Inspector-General of Prisons, and the District Magistrate of Patiala.

2. That Mr. Warburton had been suspecting the existence of sedition in territory of H. H. the Maharaja for some time past and had been engaged in pursuing the authorities to believe that his suspicions were not ill-founded.

3. On the 11th October and the following days 84 persons were arrested at Patiala and other important stations in the State. All Arya Samajists including Rai Jowah Prasad, Executive Engineer, President of the local Samaj, Lala Lachman Das, B.A., Secretary, Lala Nand Lal, Accountant, P. W. D., Lala Baij Nath, B.A., & T. Head Master of the State High School at Patiala and many other gentlemen of position and standing. Even the poem of the Samaj was arrested and the Samaj Mandir was locked and placed under Police Guard.

4. That no intimation was given to the persons arrested of the nature of the charge against them except that sections 124A and 124B were mentioned in the warrants.

5. That the searches made were irregular and illegal in as much as they were conducted in utter disregard of the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Code. It also came to light that they were not made on any clue as to the existence of incriminating matter in the houses of the accused but with the idea of finding out anything which could be proved to be incriminating. Cartloads of papers and books found in the houses were removed including books like the Bible and the Ramayana and photos of Swami Dayananda Saraswati.

A special Court was constituted by order of His Highness the Maharaja with the powers of a High Court to try these cases. When the Counsel for the accused appeared before the Special Court it was discovered that the orders of the Court, notwithstanding, no complaints had been lodged and no papers had been sent to the Special Tribunal. Mr. Warburton had acted in a manner which went to show that he had little regard either for the form of Law or for the authority of the Special Tribunal. Though Mr. Roshan Lal, the Counsel for the accused, approached Mr. Warburton armed with the written order of the Court, he was refused permission to see his clients on the strange and astounding plea that the investigation was still proceeding. One of the accused succeeded in obtaining an order from the Court for his release on bail. This Order was coolly disobeyed and the poor man was not released till the 22nd of November when the accused were brought to Court and the police applied for a further remand. It is interesting to note that Mr. Warburton, though he did not think much of acting in defiance of the express order of the Court in regard to the release of poor Chiranji Lal, released, on his own authority, one man Phul Chand on his personal recognisance.

The case came on for hearing on the 22nd of November. The police produced in Court cartloads of "seditious literature" including copies of the Ramayana, the Mahabharata, the Bible and works of Swami Dayananda Saraswati. No complaint was produced and it was even admitted that there was none on the file. The police applied for a remand. The Court adjourned the hearing of the case to the 25th of November when Mr. Grey appeared on behalf of the prosecution. Even on that day no complaint was lodged. The accused were not brought to Court and the judges as well as pleaders for the accused were kept waiting long for Mr. Grey who was cloaked with the Maharaja. After an hour's waiting an order was received from His Highness summoning the Judges to his presence. The Judges returned after an hour and a half and the case was taken up. The Counsel for the accused insisted upon the sanction and the complaint being put in before the case could proceed. Mr. Grey opposed the demand on the curious plea that the provisions of the Criminal Procedure Court did not apply to the State wholly and that the "Maharaja was the law there." The Court overruled Mr. Grey's objection and he promised to prepare the complaint. The question of remand was then taken up. The Counsel for the accused opposed the application on the ground that it was unfair to keep the accused in custody when there was not the slightest evidence of their guilt before the Court. The question of bail was also taken up. The Defence Counsel pointed out that there were no reasonable grounds for believing that the accused had committed an offence. The Court promised to pass orders on the next day. In spite of the assurances of the police in open court that no difficulties would be placed in the way of the Counsel seeing their clients the Superintendent did not accord the permission. A written application was submitted to the Court complaining of this. On this the Court reiterated its order. Eventually the application for bail was refused and the police got another remand. The next hearing of the case was fixed for the 13th of December, 1909. On the first of December, the Maharaja issued an order that no pleaders not enrolled in the State could be permitted to appear for the defence unless they had previously obtained the permission of His Highness and that those permitted to appear would have to submit to all conditions and restrictions as to the length of examination, cross-examination and final speeches that the Court might think fit to impose. The case came on for hearing on the 15th. The complaint was produced. The majority of the accused were charged with being members of the Arya Samaj and the rest with being sympathisers thereof. It was alleged that the meetings of the Samaj were used for discussion of seditious subjects and the spreading of sedition. It was further alleged that the accused, with others, had conspired to deprive the King-Emperor of the sovereignty of British India. They were charged under sections 121A, 124A, 153A, and 505. Mr. Grey objected that the Counsel for the accused (who had been appearing since the case began with the permission of the Court) could not appear unless they had obtained the permission of the Maharaja to do so. The Court ruled that the order of the Maharaja could not have retrospective effect. Grey persisted in his demand even after the decision of the Court had been given. At this the Court said that their orders would be adhered to. The sanction was put in and it was argued on behalf of the prosecution that no written sanction was necessary as long as the Court was satisfied that the prosecution had been launched with the sanction of His Highness.

Mr. Grey further said that he had in his possession a file containing the sanction but he was not prepared to put it in as it was a confidential document. On the Court's expressing an opinion unfavourable to Mr. Grey he held out a threat that in that case he would ask for adjournment in order to appeal to the Maharaja. On the 16th too the sanction and the list of witnesses were not submitted. When the list of accused submitted with the complaint was verified it was found that five of the accused were absent and eight persons were under custody whose names were not in the list. One of these eight had been illegally confined in a solitary cell for twenty-two days. Some of the accused complained of illegal treatment. On the 17th Mr. Grey contended that the Court had no jurisdiction over those 8 persons although, as a matter of fact, the prosecution had obtained remand after remand for their custody from that very Court. Mr. Grey then opened the case for the prosecution. He said that he would produce indirect evidence from which the Court would have to presume and draw inferences. He arrested that the Samaj worked on the lines of a conspiracy and was a seditious body. The "Sattiyarath Prakash" contained passages in which the founders of other religions were foully attacked. The Review of Religions, a Mahomedan and virulently anti-Aryan Magazine, was cited as an authority. The religion of the Samaj was based on abuse and the Samaj was, therefore, guilty under Section 153A. The perusal of Mr. Grey's speech leads one to the conclusion that there is no incriminating evidence against the accused and that their sole offence is that they are Aryas by faith and are malicious in spreading the doctrines of the Vedic Religion and criticising other faiths. Mr. Grey was asked by the Court to furnish an abstract of the police report together with a list of witnesses. On the 18th he urged once again that the production of the police report would be prejudicial to the prosecution. The hearing of the case was postponed till the 3rd of January. So the accused have been in custody for about 3 months without the prosecution having filed the necessary sanction for all the accused and without their being told specifically anything about the crimes of which they are suspected. The anxiety of the prosecution to hamper the accused in their defence at every step and in every possible way is evident.

A Dacca Arrest.

The arrest of Indrade Charan Gupta, an employee of the Nawab, was in connection with a conspiracy to assassinate the Nawab. This rumour was based on the many rambling statements Indrade Charan had made before the police. He said that he knew of the existence of many secret societies and their work which, however, he could not localise or identify. The man seems to be an imbecile. He was arrested on charges of theft that had recently occurred in the Nawab's household.

TARANATH ROY CHOWDHURY. CASE AGAIN ADJOURNED.

In the Court of Mr. Swinhoe, Officiating Chief Presidency Magistrate, Taranath Roy Chowdhury, of Rajah's Lane, was placed again on his trial under the Arms Act for possessing revolvers and ammunition without license.

About a year ago the house of the accused was searched by the Calcutta police on a warrant, and a box containing the weapons and ammunition was discovered. The accused had, however, been suspended. A search was instituted, and he was eventually traced to Benares, where he was arrested a week or two ago.

Babu Taraknath Sadhu who appeared for the prosecution, said he was not ready to proceed with the case as the Alipore Bomb case record had not yet been received by him. He accordingly applied for an adjournment, which was granted.

At this stage, Mr. N. Sen, Barrister-at-law, intimated to the Magistrate that he wanted to have an interview with the accused, his client, in order to receive instructions from him.

Chief Court Inspector Mukerjee submitted that according to the jail rules, the interview should take place in the presence of a police officer, and that he had sent for a C. I. D. inspector for the purpose.

Mr. Sen: Of course your Honor, a C. I. D. officer might be present at a certain distance but I cannot take private instructions from my client in the presence of an officer who is instructing the prosecution I should like to keep my defence a secret at this stage.

Mr. Mukerjee: But according to the jail rules, an interview must always take place in the presence of the jail jemadar and the principle applies here.

Mr. Sen: When the accused is before your Honor, he is entirely at the discretion of the Court. The jail rules are, therefore, not applicable now. Besides, your Honor has had sufficient experience as to how my case could be affected if I take my instructions in the presence of a police officer. I am even ready to have the interview in the Court room instead of in the lock-up.

The Magistrate: Of course the interview cannot take place within the hearing of a police officer. He must be at a reasonable distance.

Mr. Sen was granted permission to have an interview in the Court lock-up, and the case was adjourned to the 26th instant.

INDIAN REFORM.

The "Pioneer's" London correspondent wires: "Lord Cromer, addressing the Classical Association on Ancient and Modern Imperialism, compared the achievements of Roman imperialism with our work in India and Egypt. Whatever impoverishment India had suffered, he said we had done more good than bad and our Government was inspired by beneficent intentions, such as never influenced the policy either of the Roman imperialists or of the indigenous Asiatic rulers. It was unless to hazard conjectures as to the consequences of the recent experiments in India. He was disposed to agree that our duty lay in a reasonable development of self-governing principles. The consequences might include serious difficulty in governing India, but he altogether rejected the extreme consequence of a withdrawal from the country."

TRANSVAAL INDIANS.

Mr. Gandhi and Mr. Polak, representatives of the Transvaal Indians took the platform last night on the 18th instant at the Town Hall Agia and addressed a crowded meeting on the subject of the grievances of the Indians in the Transvaal. Mr. Polak made a fervid appeal for subscriptions and urged his hearers to come forward and render assistance and support to their compatriots in the Transvaal. On a list being handed round nearly Rs. 1,000 was subscribed on the spot. Mr. Alay Naba, member of the Provincial Council and Mr. Narayan, Peshwa Asthana Vakil and Municipal Commissioner, were among the speakers.

Before the meeting broke up, a resolution condemning the dastardly murder of Mr. Jackson, Magistrate and Collector of Nasik, was adopted.

MRS BEASANT'S UNIVERSITY SCHEME.

The petition to be forwarded to the King's Most Excellent Majesty in Council by Mrs. Besant, concerning the proposed University of India, contains the following:—

"For some time past your petitioners have felt the need for, and have been desirous of, establishing a new university in India having a field of activity of a distinctive character from the existing universities, and possessing special features of its own. The most marked speciality of the proposed university will lie in the fact that it will affiliate no college in which religion and morality do not form an integral part of education given. It will make no distinctions between religions, accepting equally Hindu, Buddhist, Parsi, Christian and Mahomedan, but it will not affiliate any secular institution. It will thus supply a gap in the educational system of India, and will draw together all the elements which regard the training of youth in honour and virtue as the most essential part of education. It will be a nursery of good citizens instead of a mint for half-made men. A standard of knowledge. The most important speciality will be the placing in the first bank of Indian philosophy, history, and literature, and seeking in these, and in the classical languages of India the chief means of culture. While Western thought will be amply studied, Eastern will take the lead, and Western knowledge will be used to enrich, but not to destroy or cripple, the expanding national life. A third that and important speciality will be the paying of special attention to manual and technical training to science, applied to agriculture and manufactures, and to Indian arts and crafts, so as to revive these now decaying industries, while bringing from the West all that can usefully be assimilated for the increasing of national prosperity. The interests of education in India will be greatly advanced by the proposed undertaking, and the success of the said undertaking will be greatly promoted.

Mrs. Besant is the only European member on the Board of Trustees of the proposed university, all the rest being Indians.

A LADY ZEMINDAR'S CASE.

A Dacca correspondent telegraphs that in the dacoity case in which Sreenati. Anandamoyee Chaudhurni, a lady zemindar charged a number of persons, including some pleaders, with breaking into her house, assaulting her and carrying away over a lakh worth of jewellery and cash, the Deputy Magistrate has issued summons against five of the accused, but refused process against the pleaders.

SIR GEORGE CLARKE.

His Excellency the Governor of Bombay arrived at Rajkot at 5 p.m. and was received by the Agent to the Governor who introduced the chiefs of the Province.

His Highness, the Jain of Janmagar read an address on behalf of the Princes and Chiefs of Kathiawar expressing their detestation and abhorrence of the propaganda of sedition which led to the attempt on the Viceroy's life at Ahmedabad and the foul crime at Nasik and stated that the infection of disaffection had been kept out of Kathiawar Province. His Excellency in the course of his reply said:—"The difficulties and responsibilities of Government do not tend to diminish and the recent foul crimes, which you and I deplore, might well discourage all who are devoting their lives in a spirit of true sympathy to promoting the progress and well-being of the people of India. We shall not regard them in this light and while we keenly feel the disgrace which has been brought upon our Presidency by the murder, by enemies of the human race, we shall go straight on undeterred and undiluted in the discharge of our duties, believing that we have the support of every true man from prince to peasant in this country. Sedition in the form of prevailing race hatred is not likely to reach the masses of the people in Kathiawar. In its other form, that of seeking to undermine all lawful authority it may find a way into this province if it cannot be checked in time. Should this be, the Princes and Chiefs of Kathiawar will know how to deal with it and will as in the past show their devoted loyalty to the throne of His Majesty the King-Emperor and to British power with which as you justly say your destinies are lastingly intertwined and under the guardianship of which your peaceful onward progress is assured.

LAHORE SEDITION CASE.

In the joint trial of Lal Chand and Kishen Singh, accused filed a list of defence witnesses from outside the Punjab. The Government Advocate, Mr. Petman objected to some of the questions written out by the accused for examination of witnesses who are to be examined by commission. Counsel objected to questions 9 and 11 put to Dr. Rashbehari Ghose. He said, individual opinion could not be relevant. There are Moderates, Extremists and men of all sects in this country. The Court struck out the question 9 and the wording of question 11 was changed. Counsel objected to question 13 put to Mr. Gokhale and it was altered. Counsel also objected to the question about opinion of Sir G. Clarke about the "Servants of India Society Library." This was allowed after a verbal alteration.

Sheik Ghulam Kadir Faahi examined by the accused Lal Chand, said that he translated the "Mysteries of the Court of London" into Urdu and sold the translation for six or 7 years. In 1829 he was warned by the Local Government through the Deputy Commissioner, Shikot and all the copies of the book he had were confiscated. He also admitted that about two years ago Naryan Das, another publisher, who translated Hindman's speech was ordered to make over all copies to Govt.

THE CASE AGAINST LAL CHAND.

At the hearing of the case against Lal Chand for publishing a book "Government service" the accused stated he did not wish to cross-examine the Government Translator, nor did he like to put in any defence. He prayed the Court to destroy all copies of the book he had published and discharge him after he had apologised. The Court recorded the statement of the accused.

THE DEPORTATIONS.

The master of Elibank, in his speech at Wallyford in Midlothian, replying to a question with regard to the Indian deportations, said he accepted full responsibility for the action of the Indian Government in exceptional circumstances, but he could not add to the statements made in the House of Commons in vindication of the Government. ## REVOLVER AND CARTRIDGES FOUND.

In connection with the murder of Mr. Jackson at Nasik it might be remembered that amongst those arrested in Bombay on suspicion of being implicated in the conspiracy for murder is one Chaturbhuj Javerbhai, Ameen Pattidar of Nadiad who was arrested in his house in the fort a few days ago. Inspector Naonji of the Criminal Investigation Department, under orders from Mr. Guider who is in charge, of investigations, went to Vinod town in Borad Taluka, the native place of Chaturbhuj, and searched his house when one automatic revolver of Browning pattern and two cartridges were found concealed under the eaves of the roof. They were seized by the Inspector.

THE "AKASH" SEDITION CASE.

The sedition case against Goneshi Lal, editor, printer and publisher of the newspaper the "Akash", was taken up on the 11th January by Mr. Harrison, the Special Magistrate. The accused offered an apology, which was accepted by the Court, subject to the production of one surety of rupees one thousand. The following are the wordings of the apology: "I beg to express my deep regret for having written and published a seditious poem entitled "Bharat Mata ki farayad" in the issue of my newspaper, the "akash" dated 4th November, 1900, and for other articles, published from time to time in the "Akash" which I know to be seditious, objectionable. I humbly apologize to Government for publishing these articles and beg for forgiveness, and I hereby solemnly undertake not to write or publish any seditious matter in future."

GOORKHAS AT DACCA.

On the 11th instant in an ordinary ticca ghari, two girls of a very respectable zamindar's family were proceeding to the Eden Female School with their ayah. The driver seems to have displeased a detachment of six Goorkhas who were going to the Bank of Bengal, on which the latter first fell upon the driver, belabouring him with the butts of their guns. After this the Goorkhas fell upon the carriage and smashed one of the windows of the ghari. A crowd gathered, but none of them dared to intervene except Babu Satish Chandra Ghosh, late Accountant of the Nowah. He was very roughly handled. The girls were so much frightened they had to be escorted by Satish Babu to the Eden Female School in another ghari.

TOBACCO.

Experiments in the cultivation and curing of tobacco, which are in progress in Bengal, Madras and in part of Bombay Presidency have yielded some encouraging results. Among foreign varieties, Zimmer's Spanish has been found to give the best result at Pusa and Dalsing Serai, Tirhoot, both in point of quality and quantity. It is a plant which appears in every way suited to the soil and climate of Behar, and possibly to other parts of India. The variety is very much appreciated by the cultivators in Behar. Much work, however, remains to be done with regard to the indigenous varieties. Locally grown manufactured tobacco would probably take the place of imported tobacco, if proper methods of cultivation and curing were practised. But the many difficult problems connected with cultivation and curing yet remain to be solved. The Eastern Bengal and Assam Department has undertaken the study of these problems at Rungpur. The scheme of experiments proposed for this firm is based on enquiries made in the tobacco growing districts of Eastern Bengal and Assam. The results are, therefore, likely to be of substantial benefit to the ryots. A new curing house has been erected at Nadiad in Northern Gujrat from funds given by the Inspector-General of Agriculture in India, and was used for the first time last year. The leaf cured in the new bran was sent for valuation to the State Tobacco Co. of Bombay who declared it suitable for the purposes now served by imported leaf. The best sample was valued at annas per lb., when the value of country cured tobacco was 1 to 1½ annas. The advantages of deep ploughing for tobacco have been fully demonstrated at this station. Manurial experiments have shown that castor cake (9000lb.) with farm yard manure at the rate of 10 tons per acre gives a substantial net profit. This fact is of special interest in Northern Gujrat, because castor cake is largely manufactured at the Sabarmati mills near Ahmedabad. The effect of these manures was considerably enhanced by deep cultivation. Burma, arrangements have been made to experiment with American varieties and to introduce new methods in the experiments. In Madras Messrs. Spencer and Co. of Dindigul, are continuing experiments to determine whether good wrapper leaf can be obtained from Indian growth tobacco. Dr. Butler and Mr. Lefrey have made progress in investigations regarding the fungoid and insect pests which affect this crop. Mr. Howard hopes soon to complete the botanical survey of Indian tobaccos.

DIRECTOR OF INDUSTRIES.

Mr. C. W. F. Cotton, Acting Director, Department of Industries, having submitted the annual report to Government, the latter have passed order thereon and consider that there was satisfactory progress in every branch of the work under control of the Director. Referring to the remarks in paragraph 14 of the report the Government observe that it is not desired to obtain "a dividend-paying profit" from the Sembiam factory. The original object with which that factory was established was to demonstrate the possibility of successful carrying on in this presidency on commercial lines, of chrome tanning process in order both to assist the agricultural industry of the country and to avoid semblance of competition with private concerns. The manufacture of coarse leather was undertaken and making of shoes and boots arose in consequence of the difficulty of disposing of leather cutting not utilisable in the making of water-buckets, but Government have ordered that this branch of work should be closed as soon as possible and the work of the department restricted to manufacture of water buckets and making of sandals for sale to Government departments. The Director's attention has been drawn to the matter and he is requested to report when effect will be given to the wishes of Government on this subject. The Government agree with Mr. Cotton as to the useful results which might follow from the development of Co-operative Credit Societies for weaving and desire that the Director will in communication with the Registrar of the Co-Operative Credit Societies endeavour to take practical action to start such societies on a sound basis. The work done by the department in the promotion of pumping installations and well improvement is of great importance and Government trust that it is being pushed on by the current year.

INDUSTRIAL SURVEY.

His Excellency the Governor of Bombay in Council has had under consideration the question of instituting an industrial survey of the Presidency and has examined measures recently initiated in the other provinces in India for studying the industrial position and possibilities of those areas. The first industry selected for survey was the handloom industry of the Presidency and Mr. P. N. Mehta, a recent holder of Government of India's Scholarship for the study of textile industry in England, was selected for it. The Government have now decided to institute a survey of the leather industry of the Presidency. No expert with sufficient knowledge of industry being available in the Presidency the Governor-in-Council has selected a Mr. Guthrie, who besides having studied the chemistry of tanning at Leeds had seven years' experience of all the branches of leather industry in India. Mr. Guthrie will be employed for a term of six months from the beginning of January 1910. He is asked to report on several points. In particular the following points should be fully dealt with: (1) supply of hides and skins and conditions in which they reach the tanner; (2) tanning processes at present practised both in large establishments and at small works; (3) disposal of leather by tanners; (4) manufacture of leather goods; (5) economic condition of workers at all stages of the various processes.

ENHANCEMENT OF LAND RENTS.

A few days ago, the Court of Wards Manager issued a notice to the merchants to the effect that the rent of Chandina Karsak lands should be enhanced according to the commercial advantages. On Saturday, the Magistrate and Collector came and held a Durbar here. On Sunday he called the merchants in connection with the proposed enhancement and asked them to consent to the proposal in order to save the encumbered estate of the Bhukailash Rajas, as a token of their high regard for them. The merchants, in a body, objected to the enhancement, on the ground that they had already been overtaxed. Babu Basik Lal Pal said and Babu Pulin Behari Roy supported that they might try to raise subscriptions to help their Raja's encumbered estate, but could not consent to the proposal. The merchants contended that the proposal was inconsistent with law.

Cheap Edition of KARMAYOGIN.

The difficulty felt by many students and educated men of small means in buying the KARMAYOGIN at its ordinary price of two annas, has been so much pressed on our attention that we have found it necessary to bring out a cheaper edition at one anna a copy. It is not an easy thing in this country to establish a weekly review of this standard written in English, and it has therefore been necessary for us at the outset to place a price on the paper which should ensure its being self-supporting even with a limited circulation. The KARMAYOGIN, however, is now sufficiently successful to allow of a concession of this kind being made without financial injury. The subscribers to the superior edition will be compensated by the superior get-up and paper, while the cheaper edition will remove the grievance of the large number who have hitherto been debarred from reading the review by their scanty means.

FACTS AND OPINIONS.

The High Court Assassination.

The startling assassination of Deputy Superintendent Shams-ul-Alam on Monday in the precincts of the High Court, publicly, in daylight, under the eyes of many and in a crowded building, breaks the silence which had settled on the country, in a fashion which all will deplore. The deceased officer was perhaps the ablest, most energetic and most zealous member of the Bengal detective force. It was his misfortune that he took the leading part not only in the Alipur Bomb Case in which he zealously and untiringly assisted the Crown solicitors, but in the investigation of the Haldibari and Netra dacoities. The nature of his duties exposed him to the resentment of the small Terrorist bodies whose continued existence in Bengal is proved by this last daring and reckless crime. Under such circumstances a man carries his life in his hand and it seems only a matter of time when it will be struck from him. We have no doubt that the Government will suitably recognise his services by a handsome provision for his family. As for the crime itself, it is one of the biggest of the many bold acts of violence for which the Terrorists have been responsible. It is a crime which will prove a serious blow to the Government and the country.

perpetrators of these deplorable outrages are dastards and cowards; for, if it were so, Terrorism would be a thing to be abhorred, but not feared. On the contrary, the Indian Terrorist seems to be usually a man fanatical in his determination and daring, to prefer public places and crowded buildings for his field and to scorn secrecy and a fair chance of escape. It is this remarkable feature which has distinguished alike the crimes at Nasik, London, Calcutta, to say nothing of the assassination of Gosain in jail. With such men it is difficult to deal. Neither fear nor reasoning, disapprobation nor isolation can have any effect on them. Nor will the Government of this country allow us to use what we believe to be the only effective means of combating the spread of the virus among the people. All we can do is to sit with folded hands and listen to the senseless oburgations of the Anglo-Indian Press, waiting for a time when the peaceful expression and organisation of our national aspirations will no longer be penalised. It is then that Terrorism will vanish from the country and the nightmare be as it never had been.

Anglo-Indian Press.

The Anglo-Indian papers publish their usual senseless prescriptions for the cure of the evil. The Englishman informs us that it is at last tired of these outrages and asks in a tone full of genuine weariness when the Government will take the steps which Hare Street has always been advising. It seems to us that the Government have gone fairly far in that direction. The only remaining steps are to silence the Press entirely, abolish the necessity of investigation and trial and deport every public man in India. And when by removing everything and everyone that still encourages the people to persevere in peaceful political agitation, Russia has been reproduced in India and all is hushed except the noise of the endless duel between the omnipotent policeman and the secret assassin, the Englishman will be satisfied,—but the country will not be at peace. The Indian Daily News more sensibly suggests police activity in detecting secret organisations,—although its remarks would have sounded better without an implied prejudgment of the Nasik case. If the police were to employ the sound detective methods employed in England and France, it would take them a little longer to effect a coup, but there would be some chance of real success. It is not by indiscriminate arrests, harassing house-searches undertaken on the word of informers and so much for each piece of information true or false, and interminable detention of undertrial prisoners in jail that these formidable secret societies will be uprooted. Such processes are more likely to swell their numbers and add to their strength. The Statesman is particularly wroth with the people of this country for their objection to police methods and goes so far as to lay the blame for the murder of Shamsul-Alam on these objections. If we had only submitted cheerfully to police harassment, all this would not have happened! The bitter ineptitude of our contemporary grows daily more pronounced and takes more and more refuge in ridiculously inconsequent arguments. Is it the objectionable methods or our objections to them that are to blame? We may safely say that, whatever influences may have been at work in the mind of the assassin, the occasional criticisms of vexatious house-search in the Bengali journals had nothing to do with his action. The Statesman does not scruple, like other Anglo-Indian papers, to question the sincerity of the condemnations of Terrorist outrage which are now-a-days universal throughout the country, and to support its insinuations it has to go so far back as the Gosain murder and the demonstrations that followed it. Those demonstrations were not an approval of Terrorism as a policy, but an outburst of gratitude to the man who removed a dangerous and reckless perjurer whose evil breath was scattering ruin and peril over innocent homes and noble and blameless heads throughout Bengal. We do not praise or justify that outburst,—for murder is murder, whatever its motives,—but it is not fair to give it a complexion other than the one it really wore. If it had really been true that a whole nation approved of Terrorism and supported the assassin by secret or open sympathy, it would be a more damning indictment of British statesmanship in India than any seditious pen could have framed. The Chowringhee paper's libellous insinuation that these secret societies are not secret and their members are known to the public, has only to be mentioned in order to show the spirit of this gratuitous adviser of the Indian people. (Nor can one pass without a smile the suggestion that the Hindu community should use the weapon of social ostracism against the Terrorists. Whom are we to outcaste, the hanged or transported assassin, or his innocent relatives?

House Search.

While we are on the subject we may as well make explicit the rationale of our objection to house search as it is used in Bengal. No citizen can object to the legitimate and necessary use of house-search as an aid to the detection of crime; it is only to its misuse that objection can be made. We say that it is misuse to harass a man and his family merely because the police have a suspicion against him which they cannot establish or find any ground of evidence for—on the remote chance of finding incriminating correspondence or ~~trans~~ in his possession. It is a misuse to take this step on the information of characterless paid informers whose advantage it is to invent false clues so as to justify their existence and earn their living. It is a misuse to farther harass the householder by carrying off from his house half his library and his whole family correspondence and every other article to which the police take a fancy and which are often returned to him after infinite trouble and in a hopelessly damaged condition. A house-search is never undertaken in civilised countries except on information of the truth of which there is moral certainty or such a strong probability as to justify this extreme step. To find out the truth of an information without immediately turning a household upside down on the chance of its veracity is not an impossible feat for detective ability in countries where all statements are not taken for gospel truth merely because they issue from the sacred lips of a policeman, and where police perjury or forgery is sure of swift punishment. Where a detective force is put on its mettle by being expected to prove every statement and take the consequences of illegal methods, they do manage to detect crime very effectively while the chances of the innocent suffering are greatly minimised. In other countries there have or have been anarchist outrages, Terrorist propaganda, secret societies, but nowhere, except in Russia, are such methods used as are considered quite ordinary in India, nor, if used, would they be tolerated by the European citizen. If the police would confine themselves to legitimate detective activity, they would receive the full support of the public and the occasional trouble of a house-search caused by the existence of a suspected relative or dependent, would be patiently borne,—though it is absurd of the Statesman to expect a householder to be cheerful under such untoward circumstances. This is the rationale of our views in the matter, and we do not think there is anything in them either unreasonable, obstructive or inconsistent with civic duty.

The Elections.

The Elections at the time of writing seem to point to the return of a Liberal Ministry dependent first on Labour, then on Irish votes for its very existence. At the end of last week after being long in a slight minority, the combined Liberal-Labour party exceeded the Conservatives by 14. But the Liberal vote, apart from the Labour representatives, was still well behind the Unionist numbers. The vicissitudes of this crisis have been utterly unlike those of any previous election. Instead of an even ebb and flow such as we find on former occasions, well-distributed all over the country, we see the United Kingdom ranged into two adverse parties on a great revolutionary issue, according to geographical, almost racial distribution, Wales, Scotland and the North are for the new age, the Centre and the South for the past. In the Southern, Midland and Eastern counties the Unionists have achieved a tremendous victory and we think there is hardly a constituency in which the Liberal majority has not been either materially, often hugely reduced or turned into a minority.

In the North, even in Yorkshire, still more in Westmoreland, the Unionists have achieved a few victories, but the verdict of the North as a whole has gone heavily against the Lords and for the Liberals. Wales is still overwhelmingly Radical in spite of one or two Conservative gains. In Scotland the Liberal party has been amazingly successful and increased its majorities in many places, maintained them in most and balanced occasional losses by compensating victories. The only everywhere has declared for revolution, as was to be expected from that ardent, mobile and imaginative sage; the frank, adventurous Scandinavian blood of the North may account for its progressive sympathies; but the rest of England is the home of the conservative, slow-natured Anglo-Saxon always distrustful of new adventures and daring innovations. The struggle seems to us to have been not so much one of opinions as of blood and instinct. It is notable that the Conservative victories have been attained not so much by the reduction and transference of the Liberal vote as by a rush of Conservative electors to the polls who did not vote in previous elections. The unparalleled heaviness of the polling shows how deeply the people have been stirred and feel the magnitude and importance of the issues.

FATE AND FREE-WILL.

A question which has hitherto divided human thought and received no final solution, is the freedom of the human being in his relation to the Power intelligent or unintelligent that rules the world. We strive for freedom in our human relations, to freedom we move as our goal, and every fresh step in our human progress is a further approximation to our ideal. But are we free in ourselves? We seem to be free, to do that which we choose and not that which is chosen for us; but it is possible that the freedom may be illusory and our apparent freedom may be a real and iron bondage. We may be bound by predestination, the will of a Supreme Intelligent Power, of blind inexorable Nature, or the necessity of our own previous development.

The first is the answer of the devout and submissive mind in its dependence on God; but, unless we adopt a Calvinistic fatalism, the admission of the guiding and overriding will of God does not exclude the permission of freedom to the individual. The second is the answer of the scientist; Heredity determines our Nature, the laws of Nature limit our action, cause and effect compel the course of our development, and, if it be urged that we may determine effects by creating causes, the answer is that our own actions are determined by previous causes over which we have no control and our action itself is a necessary response to a stimulus from outside. The third is the answer of the Buddhist and of post-Buddhist Hinduism. "It is our fate, it is written on our forehead, when our Karma is exhausted, then alone our calamities will pass from us;"—this is the spirit of tamasic inaction justifying itself by a misreading of the theory of Karma.

If we go back to the true Hindu teaching independent of Buddhist influence, we shall find that it gives us a reconciliation of the dispute by a view of man's psychology in which both Fate and Free-will are recognised. The difference between Buddhism and Hinduism is that to the former the human soul is nothing, to the latter it is everything. The whole universe exists in the spirit, by the spirit, for the spirit; all we do, think and feel is for the spirit. Nature depends upon the Atman, all its movement, play, action is for the Atman.

There is no Fate, except insistent causality which is only another name for Law, and Law itself is only an instrument in the hands of Nature for the satisfaction of the spirit. Law is nothing but a mode or rule of action; it is called in our philosophy not Law but Dharma, holding together, it is that by which the action of the universe, the action of its parts, the action of the individual is held together. This action in the universal, the parts, the individuals is called Karma, work, action, energy in play, and the definition of Dharma or Law is action as decided by the nature of the thing in which action takes place.—swabhava niyatam karma. Each separate existence, each individual has a swabhava or nature and acts according to it, each group, species or mass of individuals has a swabhava or nature and acts according to it, and the universe also has its swabhava or nature and acts according to it. Mankind is a group of individuals and every man acts according to his human nature, that is his law of being as distinct from animals, trees or other groups of individuals. Each man has a distinct nature of his own and that is his law of being which ought to guide him as an individual. But beyond and above these minor laws is the great dharma of the universe which provides that certain previous karma or action must lead to certain new karma or results.

The whole of causality may be defined as previous action leading to subsequent action. Karma and Karmaphal. The Hindu theory is that thought and feeling, as well as actual speech or deeds, are part of Karma and create effects, and we do not accept the European sentiment that outward expression of thought and feeling in speech or deed is more important than the thought or feeling itself. This outward expression is only part of the thing expressed and its results are only part of the Karmaphal. The previous karma has not one kind of result but many. In the first place, a certain habit of thought or feeling produces certain actions and speech or certain habits of action and speech in this life, which materialize in the next as good fortune or evil fortune. Again, it produces by its action for the good or ill of others a necessity of happiness or sorrow for ourselves in another birth. It produces, moreover, a tendency to persistence of that habit of thought or feeling in future lives, which involves the persistence of the good fortune or evil fortune, happiness or sorrow. Or, acting on different lines, it produces a revolt or reaction and replacement by opposite habits which in their turn necessitate opposite results for good or evil. This is the chain of karma, the bondage of works, which is the Hindu Fate and from which the Hindu seek salvation.

If, however, there is no escape from the Law, if Nature is supreme and inexorable, there can be no salvation; freedom becomes a chimera, bondage eternal. There can be no escape, unless there is something within us which is free and lord, superior to Nature. This entity the Hindu teaching finds in the spirit ever free and blissful which is one in essence and in reality with the Supreme Soul of the Universe. The spirit does not act, it is Nature that contains the action. If the spirit acted, it would be bound by its action. The thing that acts is Prakriti, Nature, which determines the Swabhava of things and is the source and constitution of Law or dharma. The soul or Purusha holds up the Swabhava watches and enjoys the action and its fruit, sanctions the law or dharma. It is the king, Lord or Ishwara without whose consent nothing can be done by Prakriti. But the king is above the law and free.

It is this power of sanction that forms the element of free will in our lives. The spirit consents not that itself shall be bound, but that its enjoyment should be bound by time, space and causality and by the swabhava and the dharma. It consents to virtue or sin, good fortune or evil fortune, health or disease, joy or suffering, or it refuses them. What it is attached to that Nature multiplies for it; what it is weary of, has viragya for, that Nature withdraws from it. Only, because the enjoyment is in space and time, therefore, even after the withdrawal of consent, the habitual action continues for a time just as the locomotive continues to move after the steam is shut off, but in a little while it slows down and finally comes to a standstill. And because the enjoyment is in causality, the removal of the habit of action is effected not spontaneously but by an established process of time of many established processes. This is the great truth now dawning on the world, that Will is the thing which moves the world and that Fate is merely a process by which Will fulfils itself.

But in order to feel its mastery of Nature, the human soul must put itself into communion with the infinite and universal Spirit. Its will must be one with the universal Will. The human soul is one with the universal Spirit, but in the body it stands out as something separate and unconnected, because a certain freedom is permitted it in order that the swabhava of things may be diversely developed in different bodies. In using this freedom the soul may do it ignorantly or knowingly. If it uses it ignorantly, it is not really free, for ignorance brings with it the illusion of enslavement to Nature. Used knowingly, the freedom of the soul becomes one with surrender to the universal Will. Either apparent bondage to Fate in Nature or realised freedom from Nature in the universal freedom and lordship of the Paramatman and Paramatma, this is the choice offered to the human soul. The gradual self-liberation from bondage to Nature is the true progress of humanity. The inert stone or block is a passive sport of natural laws. God is their Master. Man stands between these two extreme terms and moves upward from one to the other.

THE VICEROY'S SPEECH.

The speech of Lord Minto on the occasion of the first meeting of the Viceroy's Council under the new regime is a very important pronouncement; and the most momentous of the passages in the pronouncement are two, the one in which he disposes finally of any lingering hopes in the minds of the Moderates, the other in which he threatens to dispose finally of any lingering hopes in the minds of the Nationalists. It has been a Moderate legend which still labours to survive, that the intention of Lords Morley and Minto in the Reforms was to lay the foundations of representative self-government in India. This legend was perseveringly reiterated in direct contradiction of the Secretary of State's famous pronouncement that, so far as his vision could pierce into the future, the personal and absolute element in Indian administration must for ever remain. Lord Minto has now stamped his foot on the Moderate legend and crushed it into atoms. We quote the important passages in which he accomplishes this ruthless destruction.

"We have distinctly maintained that representative Government in its western sense is totally inapplicable to the Indian Empire and would be uncongenial to the traditions of Eastern populations—that Indian conditions do not admit of popular representation—that the safety and welfare of the country must depend on the supremacy of British administration—and that that supremacy can, in no circumstances, be delegated to any kind of representative assembly.... We have aimed at the reform and enlargement of our Councils but not at the creation of Parliaments. I emphasise what I have just said in view of the opinions to which advanced Indian politicians appear not infrequently to commit themselves."

In the face of speech so plain and uncompromising it will be difficult indeed to keep up the fiction that that it is only the regulations which are objectionable, and if only the regulations are changed, we can with a clear conscience accept and participate in the Reforms. The Act and the Regulations are not different in aim or purport; they have one origin, one object, one policy. Lord Minto has emphatically stated that the initiative in the Reforms was from beginning to end his own, and the facts bear out the truth of his statement. His inaugural speech has put a seal of finality on the death doom of Moderatism of which the publication of the Council's rules was the pronouncement. The objective of Moderatism is colonial self-government, the means, the grace and goodwill of the British rulers, and the two British rulers whom they have hailed as apostles and fathers of Reform have declared explicitly that in no future age, however distant, and in no circumstances, however changed, can the official supremacy be delegated to any kind of representative assembly however safely constituted. Not even, therefore a Russian Duma, that simulacrum of a Parliament, is to be granted to India even in remote and millennial futurity.

The other passage is the reference to the license of a revolutionary Press as a means of combating Terrorism. The revolutionary Press has long since disappeared and, therefore, we can only suppose that Lord Minto means the Nationalist Press and that this pronouncement heralds fresh coercive legislation. The platform has been silenced, the Press must follow. Then Thought alone will remain free from the prohibitions of the law and even that may be coerced by the deportation and exile of anyone whom the Police may suspect of entertaining liberal opinions. Just as the first-quoted passage ensures the extinction of all Moderate activity, so this menace portends the extinction of all Nationalist activity. We do not know that we shall be altogether sorry. If the Englishman is tired of assassinations, we also are tired of the thankless and apparently unsuccessful task of regulating popular discontent and pointing out legitimate paths to national aspiration on the one hand and attempting to save the officials from themselves on the other. We have only power to do the country. But we are not to feel that Fate is more powerful than the strongest human effort. We feel the menace in the air from above and below and foresee the clash of iron and inexorable forces in whose collision all hope of a peaceful Nationalism will disappear, if not for ever, yet for a long, a disastrously long season.

THOUGHTS AND COMMENTS.

(BY BIPIN CHANDRA PAL.)

Nationalism and Nationalists.

Mazzini was, as I have said, the first great apostle of Nationalism in Europe. "We—the men of the present"—he said, in a pamphlet called Faith and the Future, first written in—1835, "are standing between two epochs; between the tomb of one world and the cradle of another; between the boundary-line of the individual synthesis and the confines of the synthesis of Humanity." His voice was, as he himself confessed, but one among many that announced nearly the same ideas. But no one perhaps of his time so clearly recognised the limitations of the gospel of the French Revolution as he seems to have done. Summing up the current ideals about him, he said that the doctrine of rights, the last word of individualism "rules us still with sovereign sway; rules even that Republican party which assumes to be the party of progress and initiation in Europe; and the liberty of the Republicans—although they instinctively proffer the words duty, sacrifice, and mission,—is still a theory of resistance; their religion—if indeed they speak of any—a formula of the relation between God and the individual; the political organisation they invoke and dignify by the name of social, a mere series of defences raised up around laws framed to secure the liberty of each to follow out his own aim, his own tendencies and his own interests; their definition of the law does not go beyond the expression of the general will; their formula of association is society founded on Rights; their faith does not overpass the limits traced out nearly a century ago by a man—himself the incarnation of struggle—in a declaration of rights. Their theories of government are theories of distrust; their organs of freedom, a remnant of patched-up constitutionalism, reduces itself to the discovery of a point around which individuality and association, liberty and law, may oscillate for ever in resultless hostility; their people is too often a caste—the most useful and numerous it is true—in open rebellion against other castes, and seeking to enjoy in its turn the rights given by God to all; their republic is the turbulent intolerant democracy of Athens, their war-cry a cry of vengeance, and their symbol Spartacus". And thus summing up the life and thought about him, Mazzini declared that this was "the eighteenth century over again—its philosophy; its human synthesis; its materialist policy: its spirit of analysis and Protestant criticism; its sovereignty of the individual; its negation of an ancient religious formula; its distrust of all authority; its spirit of emancipation and resistance. It is the French Revolution over again; the past, with the addition of a few pre-sentiments; servitude to old things surrounded with a prestige of youth and novelty." And recognising the character of the times he cried out almost in deep agony of spirit—"The French Revolution crushes us, it weighs like an incubus upon our hearts, and forbids them to beat."

But Mazzini not only recognised the limitations of the message of the French Revolution, but actually worked out the logic of that great gospel of human freedom in Europe, bringing out its necessary and natural implications more rationally and completely than perhaps any others had done before. The French Revolution had started with the cry of liberty, equality, and fraternity; but it did not fully realise the organic relation existing between them. Equality necessarily followed liberty. There is no liberty without equality, as Fichte declared. You cannot have individual liberty in a society based upon inequality. The special privileges of one class would inevitably interfere with the freedom of the less favoured classes. This much the French Illumination fully recognised. Liberty and equality, therefore, formed really an organic whole the one necessitating the other. But pure individualism has no such necessary relation with fraternity. Fraternity is the formula of association, and the principle of association is very feebly grasped by individualism as the French Illumination understood it. Fraternity, therefore, in the gospel of the French Revolution, was either another name for human equality or a mere general sentiment which had no necessary relation with the general philosophy of that epoch-making movement in Europe. French humanitarianism was really more sentimental than rational. Philosophical humanitarianism can only grow from a clear and strong conception of the organic unity of the human race. It is an essentially spiritual conception. It is not merely theistic but almost pantheistic in its logical implications. It is an almost new conception in Europe. The full significance of it has not yet been grasped by what is called modern humanity. The French Revolution had almost no idea of it. It is completely antagonistic to that ideal of almost absolute individualism which formed the very soul and essence of the French Illumination. The humanitarianism of the French Revolution was therefore a mere generous sentiment. It was the expression of a broad human sympathy, not the assertion of a systematised philosophy. Claiming freedom for themselves, as the highest good, they wanted it also for others. This was the underlying meaning of the gospel of fraternity preached by the French Revolution. This sympathy was, perhaps, not a little prompted by an intense hatred of royalty and the aristocracy in general. Fraternity, as Mazzini pointed out, "does not supply any general social terrestrial aim; it does not even imply the necessity of an aim. It has no essential and inevitable relation with a purpose or intent calculated to harmonise the sum of human faculties and forces." He pointed out that fraternity, "though a necessary link between the terms liberty and equality,—which sum up the individual synthesis—does not pass beyond that synthesis; that its action is limited to the action of individual upon individual, that it might be denominated charity, and that though it may constitute a starting point whence humanity advances in search of a social synthesis, it may not be substituted for that synthesis."

Mazzini discovered that synthesis in the conception of Humanity.

Equality, fraternity, liberty, as summing up the gospel of individualism, must seek and find their legitimate meaning and purpose in this conception of Humanity. For the law of the individual, as he said, can only be deduced from the law of the species. The individual mission can only be ascertained and defined by placing ourselves upon an elevation, enabling us to grasp and comprehend the whole. And Humanity is this whole. This is almost an organic conception of Humanity, and this conception revealed the necessity of a general co-operation, of harmony, of effort, in a word, of association,—in order to fulfil the work of all. Hence, also the necessity of a complete alteration in the organisation of the revolutionary party, in our theories of Government, and in our philosophical, political, and economical studies; all of which have hitherto been inspired solely by the principle of liberty. The sacred word, Humanity, pronounced with a new meaning, has opened up a new world before the eye of genius—a new world as yet only forefelt—and commenced a new epoch.

This humanity was with Mazzini the Word of this new epoch. "By the affirmation of a new epoch," he declared; "we have found the existence of a new synthesis; a general idea destined to embrace all the terms of the anterior synthesis plus one; and starting from that new term to co-ordinate all the historical series, all the facts, all the manifestations of life, all the aspects of the human problem, branches of human knowledge that are ranged beneath it. We give a new and fruitful impulse to the labours of intelligence; we proclaim the necessity of a new encyclopædia, which, by summing up and comprehending all the progress achieved, would constitute a new progress in itself. We place beyond all controversy, in the rank of ascertained truths, all the terms which have been the aim of past revolutions,—the liberty, equality, and fraternity of men, and of peoples. We separate ourselves forever from the epoch of exclusive individuality, and, still more decisively, therefore, from that individualism which is the materialism of that epoch. We close up the paths to the past. And, finally, by that affirmation we reject every doctrine of eclecticism and transition; every imperfect formula containing the statement of a problem without any attempt to solve it; every school seeking to conjoin life and death; and to renew the world through the medium of an extinct synthesis. By the very character of the epoch we proclaim, we furnish a new basis to the principle of universal suffrage; we elevate the political question to the height of a philosophical conception; we constitute an apostolate of Humanity by asserting that common law of nations which should be the sign of our faith."

This conception of Humanity as the Law and the Aim, as well of individuals as of nations, and the Principle of Association through which alone can this law be fulfilled and this aim fully realised,—revealed to Mazzini that ideal and philosophy of nationalism of which he was the first, and up till now almost the only distinguished apostle in Europe.

CHAPTER XIII.

Mohendra cried out, "What have you done, Kalyani, what have you done?"

Kalyani returned no answer, but taking the dust of her husband's feet on her head, only said, "Lord and Master, words will only multiply words. I take farewell."

But Mohendra cried out again, "Kalyani, what have you done?" and began to weep aloud. Then Kalyani said in a very soft voice, "I have done well. You might otherwise neglect the work given you by Heaven for the sake of so worthless a thing as a woman. See, I was transgressing a divine command, therefore my child has been taken from me. If I disregarded it further, you too might go."

Mohendra replied with tears, "I could have kept you somewhere and come back,—but my work had been accomplished. I could have again been happy with you, Kalyani, my all. Why have you done this thing? You have cut from me the hand by whose strength I could have held the sword. What am I without you?"

"Where could you have taken me? Where is there any place? Mother father, friends, all in this terrible time of calamity have perished. In whose house is there any place for us, where is the road we can travel, where will you take me? I am a burden hanging on your neck. I have done well to die. Give me this blessing that when I have gone to that luminous world, I may again see you." With the words Kalyani again took the dust of her husband's feet and placed it on her head. Mohendra made no reply, but once more began to weep. Kalyani again spoke;—her voice was very soft, very sweet, very tender, as she again said, "Consider who has the strength to transgress what God has willed. He has laid his command on me to go; could I stay, if I would? If I had not died of my own will, inevitably some one else would have slain me. I do well to die. Perform with your whole strength the vow you have undertaken, it will create a force of well-doing by which I shall attain heaven and both of us together will enjoy celestial bliss to all eternity."

Meanwhile the little girl threw up the milk she had drunk and recovered,—the small amount of poison that she had swallowed, was not fatal. But at that time Mohendra's mind was not turned in that direction. He put his daughter in Kalyani's lap and closely embracing both of them began to weep incessantly. Then it seemed that in the midst of the forest a soft yet thunder-deep sound arose,—

"O Hari, O Murari, O foe of Kaitabh and Madhu!
O Gopal, O Govinda, O Mukunda,
O Shrutri!"

By that time the poison had begun to act on Kalyani, her consciousness was being somewhat taken from her; in her half-unconscious one could hear the sound of herself to hear the voice rising out in the marvellous forest. She had heard in the Vaikuntha of her dream.

"O Hari, O Murari, O foe of Kaitabh and Madhu!

O Gopal, O Govinda, O Mukunda, O Shani!"

Then Kalyani in her semi-consciousness began to sing in a voice sweeter than any Apsara's.

"O Hari, O Murari, O foe of Kaitabh and Madhu!

She cried to Mohendra, "Say, 'O Hari, O Murari, O foe of Kaitabh and Madhu.'"

Deeply moved by the sweet voice that rose from the forest and the sweet voice of Kalyani and in the grief of his heart thinking "God my only helper," Mohendra called aloud,

"O Hari, O Murari, O foe of Kaitabh and Madhu!"

Then from all sides the sound arose,

"O Hari, O Murari, O foe of Kaitabh and Madhu!"

Then it seemed as if the very birds in the trees were singing,

"O Hari, O Murari, O foe of Kaitabh and Madhu!"

It seemed as if the murmurs of the river repeated,

"O Hari, O Murari, O foe of Kaitabh and Madhu!"

Then Mohendra, forgetting his grief and affliction and full of ecstasy, sang in one voice with Kalyani,

"O Hari, O Murari, O foe of Kaitabh and Madhu!"

From the forest the cry seemed to rise in chorus with their song,

"O Hari, O Murari, O foe of Kaitabh and Madhu!"

Kalyani's voice became fainter and fainter, but still she cried,

"O Hari, O Murari, O foe of Kaitabh and Madhu!"

Then by degrees her voice grew hushed, no sound came from her lips, her eyes closed, her body grew cold, and Mohendra understood that Kalyani had departed to Vaikuntha with the cry of "O Hari, O Murari" on her lips. Then Mohendra began to call out loudly like one frantic making the forest quiver, startling the birds and beasts,

"O Hari, O Murari, O foe of Kaitabh and Madhu!"

At that time she came and, embracing him, began to call out like one frantic making the forest quiver, startling the birds and beasts,

Then in that glory of the infinite, in that boundless forest, before the body of her who now trospelled the eternal way, the two sang the name of Eternal God. The birds and beasts were voiceless, the earth full of a miraculous beauty,—the fitting temple for this highest anthem. Satyanda sat down with Mohendra in his arms.

INSPECTOR ALUM SHOT DEAD.

At the High Court on Monday evening at 5-30 P.M. an outrage was perpetrated by a Bengalee youth of about twenty, who shot dead Khan Bahadur Moulvi Shama-ala Alum, Deputy Superintendent of Police, attached to the Criminal Investigation Department. The Khan, Bahadur, it will be remembered was in charge of the Alipur bomb case right through from its institution. In fact he was described by Mr. Eardley Norton as his right hand man.

As usual Mr. Alum was daily attending the High Court to instruct the Advocate-General, who appeared on behalf of the Crown in the hearing of the reference in the Alipore bomb appeal.

At five in the evening on Monday Mr. Justice Harrington, who is hearing the reference, rose for the day and Mr. Alum after arranging the books and exhibits came out of the Court room and went towards the staircase. In front of him was the Advocate-General. Mr. Alum was in the middle and was followed by Babu Atulya Charan Bose, Vakil, who is appearing in the case on behalf of the Crown.

Little suspecting the fate that awaited him Mr. Alum turned towards the step near the Court room on the south-east corner of the High Court, when he came in contact with a young Bengalee of rather short stature who appeared to be not of strong physique. He was dressed simply in a white "dhoti," a white shirt and a brown shawl wearing a pair of brown pump shoes.

Mr. Alum started back and almost immediately the report of the firing of a revolver was heard. The assassin who evidently was hanging about the verandah and watching the movements of his victim was prepared from behind and aimed the shot from close quarters, the revolver, almost touching the body of Mr. Alum. The shot penetrated right into the heart of Mr. Alum fell on the verandah on his back. He twice said "Pakroo" "Pakroo" and then dropped. All present there came to his assistance and poured water over the body, which was then bleeding profusely. In the meantime a cry of murder was raised and several men chased the murderer, who tried to escape.

In the confusion the assassin came down unopposed and ran towards the gate on the east side of the Old Court building, facing Old Post Office Street. Finding the passage blocked at the gate and a mounted police officer on duty the assassin fired a second time to scare away the crowd. This had the desired effect and finding the way clear he ran towards Hastings Street, revolver in hand.

The mounted Police officer gave chase but as the thoroughfare was crowded he could not keep pace with the assassin who was running at full speed. Ramdin a durwan attached to the gate of the new wing of the High Court, along with other peons followed the assassin to a distance of about fifty yards towards Hastings Street. Just in front of the office of Messrs. Pugh and Co., Constable Ram Jharan Singh L. 2 arrested the assassin from behind. A fierce struggle followed and before the assassin could use the deadly weapon the mounted policemen and the durwan came to the spot and succeeded in snatching the revolver away from his hands.

The revolver was a brand new six-chambered one, and of a bull-dog type. Two exploded cartridges and four unused ones were found in the chambers.

After he was secured, the assassin's person was searched and he was almost immediately sent to Waterloo Street Thana.

Information was immediately conveyed to His Lordship the Chief Justice and Judges, Hargreaves and Stephens, who had not yet left the Court, and their Lordships immediately hastened to the spot and viewed the body. The Hon. Mr. Halliday, Commissioner of Police, Mr. Bailey, Deputy Inspector-General of Police and several other police officers immediately arrived at the High Court, Major Hargreaves, I.M.S. Police Surgeon was sent for and on his arrival the body was examined. The Surgeon declared that life was long extinct, death being instantaneous.

Several questions have been put to him which he has either refused to answer or in the alternative fenced with them. When asked his name, he smilingly said he did not know. When asked if he belonged to Calcutta or the Mofussil, he replied he could not remember. When asked to state from where he got the revolver, he said he did not know. The accused defiantly told the police that all they could do to him was to hang him. The police tried other means of getting information, viz., by getting some of their officers to approach him in a way as if they had met before. "Hullo" one of them said "I know you very well. I think I have met you before." The accused would fix a steady gaze on his enquirer and then reply saying that he did not know the man at all.

DACCY STUDENT'S CASE.

In connection with the Sreepur Train Daccy case, fourteen persons including the two already mentioned were taken to the jail to identify Sitanath, the alleged ringleader. Only one of them said the present accused resembled the one who had gone to purchase a boat after the occurrence, but he was not sure if he was that man. Bail was accordingly moved for by Babu Suresh Chandra Chatterji, pleader and the application was opposed by the Railway Police Superintendent. After hearing both sides Mr. Stinton rejected the application on the ground that Sitanath was absent from the college on the day after the day of occurrence.

BANK OF BURMA CASE.

At the Egmore Police Court, the hearing was resumed of the case against F. L. V. Joyce, late Manager and Parmava Pillay late cashier, Bank of Burma. The defence reserved cross-examination and an application was made on behalf of Joyce asking the court to allow them to remain on the same bail as before should he be accused by the prosecution in the Sessions. His worship was of opinion that a "prima facie" case had been made out by the prosecution and the accused would not be liberated on the same bail. The Court adjourned making the order of commitment till the 24th instant so that arrangements might be made to move the High Court immediately the order was passed.

INDUSTRIAL SCHOLARSHIPS. The South Indian Industrial Association, Burma, which was founded two years ago, has now sufficient funds to enable it to take in hand one of its principal objects, the foundation of a scholarship to enable deserving young men of South India to study industrial subjects. Babu Hemanta Kumar Sen, Head Master of the local National School, delivered a long speech, dwelling on the necessity of education as the only means of improving the social position of the depressed classes. He was followed by Babu Chandi Charan Mistry, a Namasudra representative exhorting his fellow brethren to exert themselves for education. A committee was formed consisting of some eminent gentlemen of the locality representatives of the Namasudras in the neighbouring villages. ## SUKKUR SEDITION CASE.

In the "Sindh" sedition case judgment, Verunul Chatumal has been transported for three years under section 134A and fined a thousand rupees under section 153A. Gordhanlal has got five years' transportation under section 124A and has been fined Rs. 500 under section 153A. The Court was packed with crowds who repeated shouts of "Bande Mataram." There was great sensation. The majority of the crowd wept bitterly. All were taken to jail in a garri along a road lined with crowds. Application has since been made to-day, at Karachi, in the Court of the Assistant Judicial Commissioner of Sind, for release on bail of Virumal, the printer, pending appeal. The application was refused in the judgment which is not yet available here.

THE "KHULNABASI" SEDITION CASE.

The printer of the Khulnabasi has been arrested under sections 124A and 153A for publishing a poem—aye ma, Come mother—in its issue of the 30th Aswin Jhat. The poem appeared with the name of the writer, Panchanan Ghose, who has not yet been arrested. Their houses were searched. The press and the office room have been looked up and placed under police guard.

HOUSE SEARCH AND ARREST AT MYMENSINGH.

On the 21st January, at about 5 P.M. Jnanachandra Roy and Satishchandra Sen, Sub-Inspector of Police and one constable visited Babu Gaganachandra Roy Mukteer's house at Mymensingh and arrested his son-in-law Jnanachandra Das a student of the second class of the Local Zilla School. The Sub-Inspector showed a telegram from the C.I.D. Inspector now at Bajitpur directing the arrest of the boy. He was kept in the Kotwali hajat till noon when the police sent him to the Magistrate. Babus Adharnath Sen, and Monmohan Neogi, pleaders, saw the Magistrate and prayed for bail. The Magistrate released him on 2000 in two sureties.

It is rumoured the arrest is in connection with the Dacca Ry. train dacoity. The details are not known. Information has been received that Jnan's house in the village Garaitola, 8 miles off from Bajitpur, was searched by the police. Nothing incriminating was found.

ANOTHER SEDITION CASE.

The fresh charges were framed against Lalchand Palak, for two books "Amanat Men Khayanat" and "Ungli Pakar-Ne Pancha Wakra," the latter being a translation of two chapters from Seely's "Expansion of England." The accused pleaded not guilty to both charges.

THE NETRA DACOITY.

On Friday before last Babus Nani Gopal Gupta, Bhuvan Mohan Mukherji, his brother, and Kristo Dhona Mukherji, sons of the accused Bhuvan Mohan, Jogesh Chunder Mitter and Bishnupada Chatterji, who were arrested at Sihpur in connection with the Netra dacoity, were conveyed in ticoa gharries to the Alipore Jail, escorted by ten armed police. They will be placed on trial before the District Magistrate of Alipore.

The following persons are under arrest in connection with the dacoity:—

Lalit Kumar Chuckerburty of Netra, who is alleged to have turned approver; Bhuvan Chunder Mitter, Tincowri Dasa, Narendra Nath Bose, Rajani Kanto Bhattacharji, Hem Chandra Sen, Suruth Chunder Mitter, Birendro Nath Mukerjee, Nani Gopal Gupta, Bhuvan Mohan Mukerjee, Kristo Dhona Mukerjee, Jogesh Chunder Mitter, and Bishnupada Chatterjee.

A warrant of arrest is believed to have been issued against Haridas Chuckerburty. Some of the accused in the Haludhari dacoity case are also alleged to have taken part in the Netra dacoity.

In connection with above dacoity, Babu Satish Chandra Mitra was arrested on Friday last at his residence in Rajpur, in 24-Perganahs. It will be remembered that his brother, Dr. Sarat Chandra Mitra, had also been arrested. Lalit Kumar Chakrabarty, the alleged approver was for sometime in the employ of Dr. Sarat Chandra Mitra. On the day on which Dr. Mitra was arrested, his house was thoroughly searched and some phials of acid and a copy of Sahityasur were taken away.

MISCONCEPTIONS CLASSED.

The statement made on oath by Lala Lajpat Rai in the Special Magistrate's Court on Monday last should have gone to clear all misconceptions about them even in minds the most prejudiced. It will have been seen that the formidable books which he wanted to be sent to him from England, and which have been represented by some critics as intended to set young Panjab on fire, are not only very innocent reading matter, but that some of them are among the classics of English literature. No library with any pretensions to be called as such, far less a library meant for political studies, can do without such books as Locky's Histories, Justin McCarthy's historical works the "Story of Nations," or the "History of the French Revolution." Then, if Hunter's "British India" and Thorburn's "Panjab in Peace and War" could corrupt the minds of Indian youths old enough to understand them, it would be the greatest condemnation of the Indian Civil Service, some of whose distinguished members have written books by no means so complimentary to British administration in India. The literature of biography would be incomplete without the Life of Luther, the great reformer, and of Charles Stewart Parnell, the prince of constitutional agitators.

For the rest, we think there can be no misconception left in the unprejudiced mind as to what Lala Lajpat Rai meant by expressing the fear that the discontent among the agriculturists might "burst out prematurely," which was tantamount to expressing the hope that it should not, because he was not favourable to the spread of agitation amongst the ignorant classes. Incidentally, the publication of the letters has thrown a good deal of timely light on the vexed question of "Arya Samaj and politics." It has shown how even a popular leader of the Samaj ran the risk of being boycotted by his colleagues, which gradually led to his withdrawal from active partnership in its work of its governing lodion. Be it noted that this took place long before the present hue and cry against the Samaj as a political body began. We think Sir Louis Dane's attention may be drawn to this fact in view of his apparent belief that the Samaj as a body, or local branches of it, may be diverted from its professed social and religious aims into political channels by the influence of individual members.

NETRA DACOITY SEQUEL.*HOUSE-SEARCHES AND ARRESTS.

Seven arrests were made in Calcutta and Sibpur on Thursday the 19th January in connection with the dacoity at Netra Diamond Harbour, in April last year.

IN HOWRAH.

At very early-hour, on Thursday morning, Mr. Craig, D. S. P. of Howrah, with 100 constables and officers, raided seven houses in Sibpur. Searches were made at the houses of Babu Bhuban Mohan Mookerjee, Chaudhripara Lane, Babu Nani Gopal Gupta, Ashutosh Banerjee and Satya Charan Chatterjee, Sibpur Road; Babu Surendra Nath Bose and Gopal Chandra Ghosal of Kasi Nath Chatterjee's Lane. The premises of Babu Jogindra Nath Mookerjee, timber-dealer, were also searched.

The searches lasted for several hours and as a result, some occupants of the houses were arrested and sent to Alipore Jail to await their trial. The names of the accused are Bhuban Mohan Mookerjee and his son Chutan, Nani Gopal Gupta, Bhishnu Pado Chatterjee and Jogesh Mitter.

A number of documents and letters the nature of which has not yet been disclosed were seized and sent for examination.

IN CALCUTTA.

In Calcutta, premises No. 36, Machua Bazar Street, was searched resulting in the arrest of Babu Hem Chandra Sen, the well-known singer of national and Swadeshi songs. The police seized some correspondence believed to be of an incriminating character. About 6.45 a.m., on the conclusion of this search, the Police next raided premises No. 31, Sitaram Ghose's Street, occupied by Babu Mohini Mohan Chakravarty, vakil of the High Court, with a view, it is said, to arrest his son Hurry Dasa Chakravarty who is studying at the Pusa Agricultural College. As this young man was absent at College, the premises were searched in the presence of a witness, Babu Panch Cowry Mukherjee, a Government employee who is residing in the adjoining premises. The search which lasted till 10 a. m. resulted in the seizure of some correspondence of a private tutor of the children of the above-named Vakil who appeared before the Commissioner of Police and submitted a petition on behalf of his son, but what was mentioned in the petition, is not yet disclosed. The police also raided a house at Jhamapukur in the Sukia Street section of the town, said to be occupied by one Kanye Lal Chuckerbutty. Some correspondence was seized but no arrest was made.

AT KIDDERPORE.

Among other searches made in the city was that at 86-1, Diamond Harbour Road Kidderpore, in the occupation of Dr. Sarat Mitter. This house was the object of a futile raid some time ago. Further information, gained by the C. I. D. however, led to a fresh raid this morning, with the result that some papers were taken away and the doctor arrested.

The dacoity, the cause of the present raids and arrests, was committed at midnight at the house of a well-known zemindar of Netra. Over 50 masked Bengalis, it was said, raided the house, and after forcing the owner to submission, the men stripped the women of the house of all their ornaments. The safe was next broken into and emptied and after the men had ransacked the house they decamped in boats.

Various arrests have been made from time to time since, but most of them proved unsatisfactory.

Fresh information, however, has been lately gleaned by the C. I. D. and Thursday morning's arrests are, it is said, likely to lead to sensational developments.

TANNING MATERIAL INDUSTRY FOR INDIA.

There would be seem to be ample room in India just now for tanning extract industry on a large scale. The raw materials are abundant and the process of Manufacture is relatively simple. As matters stand, however, this trade in tanning extracts and materials appears to be on a very unsatisfactory basis so far as India is concerned. To show its extent we append below a statement giving the exports by sea from British India during the past two years of tanning and dyeing materials:—

Articles.	1907-08.	1908-09.
	Rs.	Rs.

It will be noticed that the figures prove that the trade is a very substantial

one. The next table gives particulars of imports of tanning and dyeing materials into British India during the past two years, and here again the sum involved is larger:—

This has the appearance of being a very satisfactory and wholly wasteful state of affairs, which could be righted by the judicious investment of not a very large amount of capital in a well equipped factory (or several of them in the different presidencies) for the up to date manufacture of tanning materials for which there is always an active demand in most countries. In this matter India should and could not only be in a position to manufacture of all the tanning materials she may require for her own use but be a very large exporter of such into the bargain almost from any point of view the manufacture tanning extracts in India from of course Indian materials merits study, for, amongst other advantages such a course would preclude the necessity of paying heavy freight charges on bulky raw material only a small percentage of which is convertible into tanning. In some cases as much three-fourths of a shipment of raw tanning materials may be waste so that a large saving in freights would be made by converting the raw materials into extract in this country. There would be still further saving by using the refuse as fuel in the preparation of the extract.

As we have said, the process of manufacture is a simple one. The machinery required is far from costly, and text book such as Proctor's Principles of Leather Manufacture (Spos, London) and modern American Tanning (Jackson Publishing Co, Chicago), are to be had that furnish all the information requisite to not only start a factory but conduct it on scientific lines. The first step is to grind the raw materials so that the tanning they contain may be easily extracted. For this purpose a grinding mill is required several varieties of which are on the market at prices far from exorbitant. In the case of divi-divi and algarobilla the tanning is so very loosely continued that no grinding is required. On the other hand myratlana and mimosa bark owing to their combined hardness and toughness, require special treatment as they tend to clog an ordinary grinding mill. For these a "Disintegrator" has been invented and does it work thoroughly. Again several kinds of disintegrators are on the market and may be readily obtained at a price that is strictly within the means of the average capitalist.

Those named are the principal grinding machines used, but an oil or other engine would be required to drive them at a high speed (perhaps as fast as 3,000 revolutions per minute) to obtain the best results with refractory raw materials. But the engine horse power for this class of work would not be excessively high and engines of the type required are now cheaply obtainable.

The raw materials having been reduced to a certain state of fineness the next step is to remove the tanning by soaking the material in water. This process is called "Leaching" and there are many inexpensive devices obtainable for hastening it. Extraction completed the next move is to concentrate, by evaporation liquor obtained from the leaching vats to the syrupy consistency of liquid extracts or to solid extracts, if such be desired. This process is carried out in an apparatus known in the trade as an 'Evaporator' and demands a certain amount of skill to ensure a uniform extract.

It is not improbable that the tanning industry in India would in itself furnish the back bone of the business to be done by a manufacturer of extracts in this country, and that the offer of such extracts at low rates would give a new stimulus to leather making and so create a still further demand for the extracts. It is well known that the exhaustion of the supply of crude tanning materials over wide tracts about the principal tanneries is becoming a very grave matter. The creation of a fresh supply in such tracts involves complicated questions of forest practice and of land tenure, and even if these were overcome the problem would remain unsolved seeing that the babul, for instance, must have from eight to ten years' growth before it becomes fit to cut for bark. It is impossible to move a large tannery in pursuit of retiring bark supply and it is impossible to carry bark profitably over more than a certain distance. But the plant required for the manufacture of extracts is not so elaborate but that it is practicable to remove it from a region that has been denuded of material and re-install it in the centre of a fresh supply. This procedure is followed in other countries. The extract represents only a small proportion of the material. As a saving in sea freights would be made in respect of exports so a saving in railway freight would be made both on exports and the substance required by Indian tanneries. Viewed from this point the proposition would appear to be one that might well commend itself to one of the large tanneries that have been filling the pinch in respect of bark and which might find it to their advantage to combine export trade with the production of such extracts as they required for their own use. In such a business it is often well to have two strings to the bow.—"Indian Trade Journal."

ASOKA AND THE BARABAR HILLS.

A recent visit to Gaya gave me an opportunity of examining the extraordinary series of caves, which are to be found in the Barabar and Nagarjuni hills at a distance of sixteen miles from the head-quarters of the Gaya District. These caves hewn out of the hardest and most close grained granite rock, polished and finished in the most marvellous manner, would be interesting in themselves, but their interest is greatly enhanced by the fact that six of the seven caves contain inscriptions which can, without doubt be referred to the period between the years 200 and 210 B. C. Three of these inscriptions belong to the Emperor Asoka and the remaining three to his grand-son Dasaratha.

The group of rocky hills containing these caves is a very conspicuous object to the east as one approaches Gaya by the railway from Bankipur. They are most easily accessible from Bela railway station. Bela is only thirteen miles by rail from Gaya and the distance from Bela to Kanwa Dal, the nearest and most conspicuous hill, is little more than four miles. Two miles further on, lie the Barabar hills which contain the three Asoka caves, while the Nagarjuni hill, containing the three Dasaratha caves, is nearly two miles more to the east.

A long scramble over slippery rocks has to be accomplished before the first of the caves is reached. All of the caves with the exception of the Gopika cave, are so situated that much time would be taken up in finding them without the help of a guide. The Karma Chopar cave which is first reached, is one of the least interesting of the series as it consists of only one rectangular room with a vaulted roof, and the inscription outside the cave has been greatly damaged that it is not possible to read more than a few words. It begins with the name Piyadasi, which Asoka used to designate himself in all his rock and pillar inscriptions and refers to the twentieth year of his reign. The second cave, known as the Sudama or Nigoha cave, is much more interesting as it is the only one consisting of two rooms, which have been completely polished. Entering through the doorway access is first gained to a rectangular room large and loftier than the single room, of the Karma Chopar cave. Its exact dimensions as recorded by Cunningham, are 23½ feet by 11½ feet, with a height of 6½ feet supplemented by a further rise of ½ foot on account of the valued. To the left of this room, as one enters the cave, is the entrance to an inner room which is almost a perfect circular shape, having a diameter of 19 feet with a hemispherical domed roof. The whole of this elaborate cave has been polished like glass. This cave contains a short inscription, recording the fact that Asoka gave the cave, in the thirteenth year of his reign, to the Ajivika ascetics. It would appear that all the caves with the possible exception of the Lomas Rishi cave, were given to the Ajivikas, who are mentioned in the seventh pillar edict of Asoka along with the Brahmans and Jainas as constituting a sect distinct from the Buddhists, and that afterwards attempts were made by some other religious fraternity to obliterate the inscriptions with a chisel in such a manner as to cease the name of the Ajivikas.

The Lomas Rishi cave, which is next approached, contains no Asoka inscription, but it apparently belongs to the same period. It differs from all the other caves in having a considerable amount of elaborate stone carving over the entrance. This carving is of a period much later than that of Asoka and it seems probable that an inscription existed outside the cave and that it was cut away when the carving was added round and above the original doorway. The fourth and last cave in the Barabar hills is much smaller than the caves just described. The first room is only fourteen feet long, eight feet broad, and the inner room which is circular, has a diameter of eleven feet and is not finished and polished like the inner room of the Nigoha cave. This cave, which is known as the Viswa Mitra cave, has a very clear and legible inscription which transliterated runs as follows: 'Lajina piyadasina davadasavasa bhishitena iyanu kubha khalatikapavataai dina Ajivikehi' has been rendered, King Piyadasi in the thirteenth year of his reign [literally, anointed twelve years] bestowed this cave in the Khalatika hill on the Ajivakas. Attempts have been made to obliterate the first three letters of the word "ajivikehi" with a chisel, but the inscription was cut so deeply in the rock that the letters are still faintly traceable.

The remaining three caves are all in the Nagarjuni hill. The Gopika cave now has a stone staircase leading up to it, which seems to be of comparatively recent origin and more likely to have been made for the benefit of persons visiting the small mosque which has been built in front of the cave than for the use of the ascetics who dwelt in the cave. The inscription has been translated, "This gopika cave was bestowed by his Majesty Dasa-ratha immediately after his accession, on the venerable Ajivikas, to be a dwelling place for them, as long as sun and moon endure." It is interesting to note that the last phrase "as long as sun and moon endure" occurs in the seventh pillar inscription of Asoka. The inscriptions in the other two caves are a reproduction of this with one slight variation in spelling excepting only the first word which is the name of the cave. These caves bear the names of 'Vahiya and Vadathika. The name of the first of these was originally read as being Vapiyaka and this name supposed to be derived from the well (vapi) which lies a few yards from the door of the cave. The characters for "H" and "P" only differ slightly, but a scrutiny of the inscription leave no doubt that the additional stroke which differentiates the "H" from the "P" is really part of the original chisel-work.

These three caves of Asoka's grandson consist of one room only and it struck me that the general finish of the workmanship was of inferior quality. The Gopika cave is the longest of all the seven caves, being over 46 feet in length, while in breadth it is only a few inches less than the Nigoha cave. The other two caves are, however, very small, being both less than seventeen feet in length. They are both close together but the Vadathika cave is in such a secluded situation that it actually escaped the notice of a pre-Mutiny archaeologist, who took copies of the inscriptions for the use of the Bengal Civilian, Prinsep, who took such a large part in decyphering the character in which these inscriptions are written. The top has been broken off and the pillar has been split vertically apparently by lightning. The inscription had been completely covered up and was only discovered in 1890 when excavations were carried on by the Nepalese authorities at the suggestion of Dr. Fuhrer. The process of silting up has been going on rapidly since then and the lowest line of the inscription is now barely a foot above the present level of the ground. In a few years it will, in all probability, again be concealed from view. It is a matter of regret that proper measures are not taken to preserve from possibilities of injury this unique memorial of the past.

The ancient name of the village as given in the inscription—the actual word is Luminigame—is preserved almost unaltered in the name of the tappa or tract containing Paderiya and about twenty other villages. The tank in which the mother of Buddha, according to tradition, bathed after the child's birth is to found on the south side of the mound.

My only regret after seeing this pillar was that the time at my disposal did not permit of a further excursion into Nepal to visit the other Asoka pillar at Nigliva in the Nepalese Terai, which records a visit of Asoka to the stupa of Konakamena Buddha. The distance of this pillar from the Paderiya pillar is about thirteen miles, but it appears that the Nigliva pillar has been moved from its original position—Pioneer.

MR. LAJPAT RAY.

The case against Bhai Parmanand came on for hearing before Mr. Harrison, Special Magistrate. The accused was charged under Section 110 of the Criminal Procedure Code. Two out of five sureties came forward as substitutes and were accepted by the Court.

Mr. Lajpat Rai's Evidence.

Lala Lajpat Rai was produced as a prosecution witness in this case and identified the two letters filed the other day in the case of Ajit Singh as his, written by Bhai Parmanand in England. Thirteen other letters were filed by the prosecution, two of which Lala Lajpat Rai admitted to be in his own handwriting and addressed to Parmanand. As the remaining eleven were not, he identified some of them Lala Lajpat Rai identified to be in the handwriting of Parmanand. In answer to questions put by the Government Advocate, Lala Lajpat Rai said:—I am acquainted with one Mr. K. Chowdhuri. I cannot identify his handwriting. I have never received any letter from him to the best of my knowledge. I got only one book to the best of my memory from England sent by Bhai Parmanand. The name of the book was the "Nemesis of Nations." It was forwarded to my knowledge that Bhai Parmanand is connected with Ajit Singh or other work."

Mr. Lajpat Rai's Statement.

Lala Lajpat Rai then made the following statement on oath:—I never conspired with Ajit Singh or Parmanand or with anybody else for the dissemination or publication of any seditious book, literature or any other paper work. I never sent any book or letter to the best of my book to Ajit Singh nor I ever contributed a single penny to such propaganda. The books I asked Parmanand to purchase for me were in connection with a political association and a political library which I intended to start at Lahore in the early part of 1907. This association was never established. It was a project only. In my letter dated 11th April 1907, there is an expression which I beg to explain. By the expression "Bursting out prematurely" I meant nothing more than that the agriculturists not being accustomed to political agitation might not be able to carry on their agitation peacefully. I was not at that stage in favour of a political agitation amongst the agricultural population.

Shyamiji Krishna Varma

Questioned about Krishna Varma Lala Lajpat Rai further stated:—Shyamaji Krishna Varma is his full name. He was Dewan in several Native States in India. Then he went to England and settled there where he founded the "India House," for the use of Indian students and other Indians. I have no personal knowledge that he is wanted by the police in England."

Proposed Political Association.

Further questioned by the defence counsel Lala Lajpat Rai stated:—In those days I was projecting an association and a library. I had read in the papers of Shyamiji's donation of Rs. 10,000 for the purpose of a political propaganda in India, and I thought I would be able to get a donation from him out of that sum for the purpose of my library. The books that I wanted from England were of the nature as contained in the list filed in this case and proved. They were of a historical and political nature."

The list of books which I wanted amongst others Herbert Paul's "History of England," "Punjab in Peace and War," "Life of Farnell," "History of the French Revolution," "Life of Luther," "Modern Europe," revolutionary and political novels, "Life of Garibaldi," "Wells' Industrial Democracy."

Continuing Lala Lajpat Rai said:—At the time I sent these letters to England I had not completed the scheme, but it was matured a few days after the letters had reached England and the scheme was published in the papers. It was meant only for advanced students, degree holders and lawyers. Rs. 50 as admission fee and Rs. 100 as annual subscription were the conditions of membership."

Lala Lajpat Rai further stated:—Till after my return from the deportation, I did not know that Shyamiji Krishna Varma entertained any political views of violence. After that I had nothing to do with Shyamiji."

In Bhai Parmanand's case, Mr. Beatty, the City Superintendent of Police, also deposed regarding the search of Parmanand's premises. The case was adjourned to 26th January.

KARMAYOGIN.

The difficulty felt by many students and educated men of small means in buying the KARMAYOGIN at its ordinary price of two annas, has been so much pressed on our attention that we have found it necessary to bring out a cheaper edition at one anna a copy. It is not an easy thing in this country to establish a weekly review of this standard written in English, and it has therefore been necessary for us at the outset to place a price on the paper which should ensure its being self-supporting even with a limited circulation. The KARMAYOGIN, however, is now sufficiently successful to allow of a concession of this kind being made without financial injury. The subscribers to the superior edition will be compensated by the superior get-up and paper, while the cheaper edition will remove the grievance of the large number who have hitherto been debarred from reading the review by their scanty means.

FACTS AND OPINIONS.

The Party of Revolution.

Be the fault whose you will, ours or the Government's, the existence of an organised party of armed Revolution in Indian politics is now a recognised factor of the situation. The enormous strides with which events have advanced and a sky full of trouble but also of hope been overcast and grown full of gloom and menace, can be measured by the rapidity with which this party has developed. It is only five years since the national movement sprang into being. The cry was then for self-help and passive resistance. Boycott, Swadeshi; Arbitration, National Education, were the hope of the future, the means of self-regeneration. In five years everything has been struck to the earth. Boycott has almost disappeared, Swadeshi languishes under sentence of arrest, Arbitration died still-born, National Education is committing suicide. A tremendous disintegration has taken place and we look amazed on the ruins of the work our labour and our sacrifice erected. It is a huge defeat, an astonishing catastrophe. And on those ruins grim, wild eyed, pitiless to itself and to others, mocking at death and defeat with its raucous and careless laughter Revolution rises repeating the language of the old-world insurgents, cherishing a desperate hope which modern conditions deny, grasping at the weapons which the Slav and the Celt have brought into political warfare. The seed which the Yugantar sowed in its brief, violent and meteoric career have borne fruit in unexpected quarters and new born journals repeat in foreign lands and in the English tongue the incitations to revolt and slaughter which have been put down by the strong in India hand of the law. Money is forthcoming to support a journalism which must obviously be all cost and no profit, young men exile themselves from their native land by openly joining the party of violence and in India itself repeated blows have been struck paralysing the hope and the effort to revive the activity of that broader and calmer Nationalism which, recognising modern conditions, still commands the allegiance of the bulk of the nation. Its Growth.

What is the precise nature, propaganda and strength of this party, which by so small an expenditure of energy has produced such surprising results? When the Yugantar, abandoning its habit of philosophic Revolutionism, first began to enter the field of practical politics, to sneer at passive resistance and gird at its chief exponents, no one thought that its change of attitude portended anything serious. Men read the paper for the amazing brilliance, grace and sustained force of its style, a new thing in Bengali journalism, and from the natural attraction men feel for strong writing and bold thought even when they do not agree with it. Afterwards the reckless fight of the Yugantar for existence attracted a more dangerous admiration and from that time the journal changed from a thing of literary interest into a political force. Even then it was taken as a practical guide only among a section of young men small in numbers and without means or influence. But things have changed since then. A void has been created by the conviction, deportation, self-imposed exile or silence of the great Nationalist speakers, writers, organisers, and the dangerous opinions and activities then created have rushed in to occupy the vacuum. The Nationalism we advocate is a thing difficult to grasp and follow, needing continual intellectual exposition to keep its hold on the mind, continual inspiration and encouragement to combat the impatience natural to humanity; its methods are comparatively new in politics and can only justify themselves to human conservatism by distinguished and sustained success. The preaching of the new revolutionary party is familiar to human imagination, supported by the records of some of the most inspiring actions in history, in consonance with the impatience, violence and passion for concrete results which revolutionary epochs generate. The growing strength of this party is not difficult to explain; it is extremely difficult to combat.

Its Extent.

This party has two sides, the propaganda carried on in foreign countries, and the Terrorist activity always recrudescing in our midst. The latter is the most formidable in the present, the former the most dangerous in the future. The foreign propaganda was first located in London and confined to the single paper, the Indian Sociologist, first an organ of Shyamji Krishnavarma's Home Rule Society and opposed to all methods of violence. The conversion of Krishnavarma to the Terrorism he once fiercely condemned, has been a very important factor in the growth of the new party. The propaganda has been driven from London only to spring at once into an ubiquitous activity abroad. From Paris Krishnavarma publishes the Indian Sociologist; from Berlin a new organ, significantly self-styled the Talwar, issues; in Geneva a paper naming itself the "Bande Mataram" busies itself with decrying the policy of the defunct "Bande Mataram" and denouncing its originator and former Editor; a paper called the Free Hindustan maintains itself in America. Wealthy men and women stand behind these organs, the Kathiawar Krishnavarma, the Parsi lady Mrs. Kama and possibly others who do not advertise their names. Young men of all nationalities in India seem to have joined these organisations and occasional pamphlets find their way into India in spite of the vigilance of the Post Office by means familiar to European revolutionism. In India any violent propaganda is possible; violent action takes its place and the swift succession of attempted or successful outrages in Guzerat, Maharashtra, Punjab and Bengal show that if the movement is not organised, as in these foreign countries, it is equally widespread. The very existence of such a conspiracy must paralyse all other forms and methods of national aspiration by driving the Government and the Anglo-Indian community into the repression of everything that goes beyond contented acceptance of that which exists. The revolutionists know this well and they have played their game with great skill and success.

Ourselves.

Every established Government is bound to eradicate a movement of this kind and it will naturally use any means it thinks effective. We recognise this necessity, but we have no faith in the means the Government and the Anglo-Indians seem to favour. We are dead against covering over an evil by pretensions, sounding and hollow speech and measures; we do not believe in a remedial system which suppresses symptoms and leaves the roots untouched. All we can do is to stand aside and let the physician try his system—and this we propose to do from henceforward. We have written this week in order to explain our action and our attitude, but we shall abstain in future from comment on current Indian politics or criticism of Government and its measures until more favourable and normal conditions return. We only reserve to ourselves the liberty of writing once to point out the immense difference between Indian condition in modern times and the historical precedents on which the revolutionists rely,—for which we had not sufficient space in this issue. With this exception the rest is silence. The Karmayogin was originally started as a weekly review intended to encourage the habit of deep and close thinking on all subjects and widen the intellectual range of the people, giving an especial importance to religion and the growth of spirituality. The disproportionate space allowed to current politics was necessitated by the absence of any political organ devoted to that propaganda of peaceful Nationalism in which we saw the only way to healthy political development in India. Now that that way is barred by the legislator and the Terrorist, we return to our original intention.

THE NECESSITY OF THE SITUATION.

A very serious crisis has been induced in Indian politics by the revival of Terrorist outrages and the increasing evidences of the existence of an armed and militant revolutionary party determined to fight force by force. The effect on the Government seems to have been of a character very little complimentary to British statesmanship. Faced by this menace to peace and security the only device they can think of is to make peaceful agitation impossible. Their first step has been to proclaim all India as seditious. Their second is to announce the introduction of fresh legislation making yet more stringent the already all-embracing law of sedition. By these two measures free speech on press or platform will practically be interdicted, since the perils of truthfulness will be so great that men will prefer to take refuge either in a lying hypocrisy, or in silence. Frankness, honesty, self-respecting and truthful opposition in Indian politics are at an end. The spirit which dictates the resort to these measures, will inevitably manifest itself also in the proclamation as illegal of all societies or organisations openly formed for the purpose of training the strength of the nation by solid and self-respecting political and educational work towards a free and noble future. By the law which gives the Government that power of arbitrary suppression associated work is rendered impossible, though not as yet penalised. If free speech, if free writing, if free association is made impossible under the law, it is tantamount to declaring a peaceful Nationalism illegal and criminal.

The effect of the recent assassinations on the Moderate party has been to throw them into a panic and demoralisation painful for any lover of Indian manhood to witness. It is quite possible for an Indian politician at this crisis to consider in a spirit of worthy gravity and serious recognition of the issues involved, the best way of combating the evil, even if it involves cooperation with a Government which persists in the repression of the national hopes and aspirations and seeks to compel cooperation by pressure instead of by winning the hearts of the people. But that is not the spirit shown by Moderate organs and by Moderate leaders. All that we can see is a desperate and cowardly saave quiput, an attempt by every man to save himself and to burrow under a heap of meaningless words. Wild denunciations of the revolutionary instruments as fiends, dastards, cowards, with loads of other epithets which defeat their purpose by their grotesque violence; strange panegyrics of the deceased police officer as a patriot, saint, martyr by those who formerly never discovered his transcendent merits or had a good word to say for the police; meetings to arrange steps for the suppression of Anarchism loudly advertised by leaders who know that they are powerless to take any effective steps in the present state of the country; Vigilance Committees which can at best pay for the hired vigils of watchmen easily avoidable by a skilful nocturnal assassin;—are these the speech and action of responsible and serious political leaders or the ravings and spasmodic gesticulations of a terrified instinct of self-preservation?

The Nationalist party can take no share in these degrading performances. On the other hand its own remedies, its own activities are doubly inhibited, inhibited from below by the paralysing effect of successful or attempted assassinations, inhibited from above by panic-stricken suspicion, panic-stricken repression. We have not disguised our policy, we have openly advertised our plans of party reconstruction and reorganisation, we have sought to speak and act candidly before the Government and the country, not extenuating the errors of the Government, not inflaming the minds of the people. The first answer to our propaganda was given by the revolutionary party in the blow struck at Nasik, the second by the Government in the extension of the Seditious Meetings Act to all India. We still felt it our duty to persevere, leaving the results of our activity to a higher Power. The assassination in the High Court and the announcement of a stringent Press legislation convinces us that any farther prosecution of the public activities we contemplated, will be vain and unseasonable. Until, therefore, a more settled state of things supervenes and normal conditions can be restored, we propose to refrain from farther political action. The Government and the Anglo-Indian community seem to be agreed that by some process of political chemistry unknown to us the propagation of peaceful Nationalism generates armed and militant revolutionism and that the best way to get rid of the latter is to suppress the former. We will give them the chance by suppressing ourselves so far as current Indian politics are concerned. We have no wish to embarrass the action of the Government or to accentuate the difficulties of the situation. The Government have no doubt a policy of their own and a theory of the best means of suppressing violent revolutionary activities. We have no faith in their policy and no confidence in their theory, but since it is theirs and the responsibility for preserving peace rests on them, let them put their policy freely and thoroughly into action. We advise our fellow Nationalists also to stand back and give an unhampered course for a while to Anglo-Indian statesmanship in its endeavours to grapple with this hydra-headed evil.

But before we resort to silence, we will speak out once freely and loudly to the Government, the Anglo-Indian community and the people. We will deliver our souls once so that no responsibility for anything that may happen in the future may be laid at our doors by posterity. To the Government we have only one word to say. We are well aware that they desire not the co-operation of the Nationalist party, but its annihilation. They trace the genesis of the present difficulties to the propaganda of the Nationalist leaders and an unstatesmanlike resentment is allowed to overpower their judgment and their insight. Choosing to be misled by a police whose incapacity and liability to corruption has been loudly proclaimed by their own Commissions presided over by their own officials, they have formed the rooted opinion that the leaders of Nationalism are secretly conspiring to subvert British rule, and neither the openness of our proceedings nor the utter failure of the police to substantiate these allegations have been able to destroy the illusion. The open espionage, menace and detective machinations to which we are subjected, are sufficient proof of its persistence. Nevertheless, it is due to the Government that we should speak the truth and it is open to them to consider or reject it at their pleasure. The one, the only remedy for the difficulties which beset them in India, is to cease from shutting their eyes on unpleasant facts, to recognize the depth, force and extent of the movement in India; the radical change that has come over the thoughts and hearts of the people and the impossibility of digging out that which wells up from the depths by the spades of repression. They are face to face with aspirations and agitations which are not only Indian but Asiatic, not only Asiatic but world-wide. They cannot do away by force with these opinions, these motions, these developments unless they first trample down the resurgence in Japan, China, Turkey and Persia and reverse the march of progress in Europe and America. Neither can they circumvent the action of natural forces which are not moved by but move the Indian political leaders. Reforms which would have satisfied and quieted ten years ago are now a mere straw upon a torrent. Some day they must make up their minds to the inevitable and follow the example of rulers all over the world by conceding a popular constitution with whatever safeguards they choose for British interests and British sovereignty, and the earlier they can persuade themselves to concede it, the better terms they can make with the future. This has been the traditional policy of England all over the world, and it has always been an evil day for the Empire when statesmen have turned their backs on English traditions and adopted the blind impolicy of the Continental peoples. They have seen at Lahore and Hughly that Moderatism is a dead force impotent to help or to injure, that whatever the lips may profess, the hearts of the people are with Nationalism. Impolitic severity may transfer that allegiance to the militant revolutionism which is raising its head and thriving on the cessation of all legitimate political activity. The Nationalist leaders will stand unwaveringly by their ideals and policy, but they may prove as helpless hereafter as the Moderates are in the face of the present situation.

The Anglo-Indian community, through its recognised organs, is now busy inflaming hostility, bounding on the Government to farther ill-advised measures of repression and adding darkness to darkness and confusion to confusion. Statesmanship they never had, but even common sense has departed from them. The Indian people made a fair offer of peace and alliance to them at the beginning of the movement by including goods produced in India through European enterprise and with European capital as genuine Swadeshi goods; but instead of securing their future interests and position by standing in the forefront of the political and industrial development of India, they have preferred to study their momentary caste interest and oppose the welfare of the country to which they owe their prosperity. As a punishment God has deprived them of reason. They are hacking at the roots of British investment and industry in India by driving blindly towards the creation of more unrest and anarchy in the country. They are imperilling a future which can still be saved by, fanatical attachment to a past which is doomed. If they could look at politics with the eye either of the statesman or of the man of business, they would see, that neither their political nor their commercial interests can be served by a vain attempt to hold this vast country by pressing a mailed heel on the throats of the people. The pride of race, the arrogance of colour, a bastard mercantile Imperialism are poor substitutes for wisdom, statesmanship and common sense. Undoubtedly, they may induce the Government to silence and suppress, to imprison and deport till all tongues are hushed and all organisations are abolished—except the voice of the bomb and the revolver, except the subterranean organisation that, like a suppressed disease, breaks out the more you drive in its symptoms. Have they ever contemplated the possibility of that result of their endeavours—the possibility that their confusion of Nationalism with Terrorism may be ignorant and prejudiced, and that the measures they advocate, may only destroy the one force that can now stand between India and chaos?

To the people also we have a last word to say. We have always advocated open agitation, a manly aspiration towards freedom, a steady policy of independent, self-sustained action and peaceful resistance to the repression of legitimate activities. That policy was only possible on condition of a certain amount of self-restraint in repressive legislation by the Government, and a great amount of courage, self-restraint, resolution and self-sacrifice on the part of the people. It appears we cannot count on any of these conditions. The rise of a revolutionist party fanatically opposed alike to the continuance of the British connection and to peaceful development makes our policy yet more impossible. A triangular contest between violent revolution, peaceful Nationalist endeavour and bureaucratic reaction is an impossible position and would make chaos more chaotic. Any action at the present moment would be ill-advised and possibly disastrous. The Government demand cooperation from the Moderates, silence from the Nationalists. Let us satisfy them and let there be no action on our part which can be stigmatised as embarrassing the authorities in their struggle with Terrorism. The self-restraint of our party after the conviction of Mr. Tilak was rewarded by the break-down of Moderatism after it had undisputed control of the press and platform for almost a year. A similar self-restraint will be equally fruitful now. Revolution paralyses our efforts to deal peacefully but effectively with Repression; Repression refuses to allow us to cut the ground from under the feet of Revolution. Both demand a clear field for their conflict. Let us therefore stand aside, sure that Time will work for us in the future as it has done in the past, and that, if we bear faithfully the burden of the ideal God has laid upon us, our hour may be delayed, but not denied to us for ever.

THE ELECTIONS.

The great election is over, the first in England which has been fought on constitutional issues since the passing of the Reform Bill in the earlier part of the nineteenth century. The forces of reaction have put forth their utmost strength and, in the result, have only succeeded in just equalising their own numbers with those of the official Liberal party. This partial success will be more fatal to the cause of reaction than a defeat. For, in the coming Parliament, the Liberal Ministry will be dependent for their very existence on the forty Labour votes that represent the frankly socialistic element in English progressive opinion. Such a state of things has never before existed in English politics and a few years ago it would have been thought impossible. Practically, Socialist opinion will rule England so long as the Asquith ministry lasts and, if the Socialists are wisely guided and refrain from abusing their opportunity, they will be able to take such steps in the modification of British politics as will ensure the triumph of Socialism in England at no distant date. Not only will the Government depend for its very existence on the Labour vote, but it will depend for its safety on Irish support. If, therefore, the Irish also are wisely guided and do not press the favourable situation too far, the long delayed concession of Home Rule is a certainty within the next two years. Necessarily, the success of the Irish and the Socialists can bear no fruit unless the veto of the House of Lords is annulled or a new elective Upper Chamber takes the place of the present absurd and antiquated institution. We have not therefore erred in forecasting a democratic revolution in England as the inevitable result of the action of the House of Lords in rejecting the Budget, or, as they euphemistically put it, referring it to the country. Mr. Balfour has recognized that the verdict of the United Kingdom has been given in favour of the Budget and against Tariff Reform. The real issue is now, what it should have been throughout, the reform, abolition or replacement of the House of Lords.

When the elections were in progress, Mr. Asquith committed himself on the question of Home Rule, and, even if he wished to draw back from it, in face of his dependence on Labour and Irish votes he can no longer retreat. All that he has done is to qualify his promise of a final solution of the Irish question by stipulating that it shall contain provision for the supremacy of the Imperial Parliament, as well as local autonomy of a liberal character for the Irish nation. This means not only the restriction of all Imperial questions to the province of the Parliament meeting in London, but the decision of questions between Ireland and England by the same body and possibly a power of veto in certain matters for the British Cabinet. It is impossible for an English statesman to go farther in the direction of Irish autonomy, and the Irish party will be well advised to accept even this qualified autonomy and make it an instrument for so developing the strength of the Irish nation as to make further concession in the future inevitable. The lifework of Parnell has not gone in vain; the two great questions he brought to a head by his masterly policy, the liberation of the Irish peasant from rackrenting landlords and the liberation of the Irish race from an unsympathetic domination, are both in process of solution within quarter of a century of his untimely end. Liberty is a goddess who is exacting in her demands on her votaries, but, if they are faithful, she never disappoints them of their reward.

For India, the elections are as favourable as an English election can be. We do not regard the defeat of pro-Indian Liberal candidates as a calamity. There is always a limit to the efforts of members of Parliament, however sincere, who are bound by ties of party loyalty and discipline not to embarrass their official chiefs beyond a certain point. The Labour members and the Nationalists are bound by no such scruples and both of these parties have sympathy with India. The one problem before us is how to turn that sentiment of sympathy into an effective impetus towards action; for in European politics sentiment is not a sufficiently strong motive unless it is supported by some practical community of interests. The Irish Parliamentary party were able to bring Home Rule into the category of realisable ideals because they made it to the interest of the British parties to get rid of the Irish difficulty; if that ideal is realised now, it will be because the interests of the English Liberals and the Irish Nationalists have become one and, therefore, they must accommodate each other. It is forces that effect great political changes, not moral sentiments or vague generalities. Even a great idea can only become operative when it is manifested as a working force with a definite aim and a distinct pressure on its environments.

(BY BIPIN CHANDRA PAL.)

Nationalism and Nationalists.

Mazzini was the first apostle and prophet of Nationalism in modern Europe. His message of Nationalism was, therefore, necessarily more a matter of faith and intuition, than the fruit of any systematised philosophy. There is, no doubt, an unconscious philosophy behind every prophetic intuition, and it was also behind Mazzini's message. But Mazzini did not fully work it out. Indeed, the materials for working out a complete philosophy of Nationalism were hardly present before him. Both Psychology and Sociology are comparatively new sciences; they are even now almost in their infancy. They were practically unknown in Mazzini's time. And it is to these that we mainly owe, what may be called, the scientific basis of Nationalism. The study of social phenomena in the light of evolution, to which we are indebted for the highest generalisations of Sociology, is a very recent attempt. It was hardly known in Mazzini's time. Besides, the East which is but very crudely understood even to-day, was but barely known in those days. And the fundamental basis of Nationalism, as a universal generalisation in Sociology, is that Absolute Idealism which is the especial heritage of the Hindu. Our highest philosophy furnishes a basis for Nationalism which is as yet unknown and unappreciated, to a large extent, in other known cultures and civilisations. Hindu Monism is the philosophical implication of that organic conception of the social life, which is the special contribution of modern Psychology and Sociology. Mazzini was hardly acquainted with this philosophy. The comparative, the historical, and the evolutionary methods, the special methods discovered by the culture of the nineteenth century, were also practically unknown to him. And it is these that have developed the new philosophy of Nationalism, as we know it today. Lastly, the world also was practically much smaller in Mazzini's day than it is now. The East had no doubt been rediscovered long before his time, but the truth that the Eastern peoples also form an organic part of Universal Humanity, representing especial types of human civilisation and possessing capitalised wealth of human culture, scarcely realised even today, was almost absolutely unknown in Europe in Mazzini's time. His profound spiritual insight and his breadth of sympathies notwithstanding, Mazzini's vision of Humanity, therefore, hardly went beyond what may very aptly be called, White-Manity.

And it is a true conception of Humanity which must always find the real basis and significance of Nationalism. Nationality is a part, Humanity is the whole, Nationality is the limb, Humanity is the body, Nationality is the organ, Humanity is the organism. The whole is the only interpretation of the parts; the body of the limbs; the organism of the organs. A true philosophy of Nationalism can only be built up on a true philosophy of Humanity. Mazzini's ideal of Humanity was perfect; and his conception of Nationality was also equally sound. No more perfect or sound conception of either exists in our mind even to-day. But the ideal is a mere form; it waits always to be filled up with the actual contents of our experience. The form and the contents are organically related to one another. And the narrowness of the contents must narrow down the actual application of an ideal, even if it does not destroy its intrinsic breadth and universality. This is what actually happened in Mazzini's case. His ideal of Humanity was a universal ideal. It was, as he distinctly put it, the necessary corollary of his faith in God,—One God, One Law. His conception of God is essentially monistic. God is "the absolute, living Thought, of whom our world is a ray, the universe an incarnation." His conception of Law is essentially organic and evolutionary. It works for an Aim, definite in the end, but progressively revealed in its advance towards that final end. Such a Law must needs have some thing by which it can be progressively interpreted and verified. This something is, to Mazzini, Humanity. This conception of Humanity is perfect. It is not a mere abstraction, on the one hand, nor is it a mere mechanical and numerical whole, on the other. It is an organic whole: "the collective and continuous Being that sums up and comprehends the ascending series of organic creations." It is the nearest approach to our own conception of Humanity. In our language and literature the concept Humanity is conveyed by Nārāyaṇa. Nārāyaṇa is the soul of all organic creations:—Sarvadehinām atma; the Witness of all the countless worlds:—Akhalalokasākshi; the Eternal Being who pervades the whole of the human race, and constitutes their essential unity, and stands behind human history as the necessary logic of human evolution and progress. It is the same as the Christ-Idea conceived by philosophical Christianity.

Mazzini's conception of Humanity is perfect, and approaches both the highest Hindu and Christian idea of it. But owing to the limitations of his time and environments, he was not able to fully work out this perfect idea in the scheme of his nationalism. Practically his vision did not go beyond Europe. Italy was to be the initiator people; Europe was to be the field of their divine mission. This somewhat limited view was only natural to him. He stood face to face with Europe. His Europe, again, was the Europe as it stood leavened by the French Illumination. The immediate problem before him was the liberation of Italy. The Vision that inspired him was that of a rejuvenated Italy, rising to claim once more her old place as the teacher and leader of Europe. He did not realise that Italy had already played out her part, in the reconstruction of European life and thought, through the Renaissance. But whatever might be the place of Italy in this new reconstruction of Europe, Mazzini's general ideal and philosophy of Humanity was, in their practical application, confined to that continent alone. Asia had not yet vitally entered the arena of European thought. Mazzini had hardly any moral and spiritual consciousness of that portion of humanity. His general ideal and philosophy of humanity, though quite capable of as much application to the larger life and more complex problems of Asia as to those of Europe, was, however, practically applied to the latter only. And, therefore, the larger illumination that always follows the application of even universal principles to fresh and wider fields, could not come to the noble, and essentially correct, conception of humanity that Mazzini had. His message failed, consequently, to be a world-message. The application even failed in Europe. Europe has not yet been trained and disciplined for this lofty gospel. It had, as yet, very little vital reference to the actualities of the European situation. The French Revolution, for one thing, had not yet completely worked itself out. People still fondly clung to the old message of rank individualism, as a saving principle in political, economic, and social life. The old shibboleths—liberty, equality, and fraternity, still held almost absolute sway over the minds of the "advanced" thinkers and workers in every European country. The conservative elements of Society, everywhere represented mainly by the ruling classes,—were deeply distrustful of the new ideas and movements among the people. And they were all over Europe secretly and silently combined in a crusade against the new forces, let loose upon society by the French Revolution. Mazzini saw, with the prevision that God gives to his prophets, both the limitations of the French gospel as well as a general outline of the new ideal of the world. Not so really his contemporaries. The time was not ripe yet for it. And visions like these, that come to those who are in advance of their age, always remain mere intuitions which, however inspiring and elevating they may be, are yet vague and undefined, like the herald of dawn in the first suspicion of a glow on the eastern horizon.

Such, indeed, was Mazzini's vision of the future dawn. He was like John the Baptist, in the Christian Dispensation, proclaiming the death of the old era, and preparing his world for a new, the full significance of which even he himself did not completely realise; while the multitudes about him, vaguely apprehensive of a change, yet hardly dared to transfer their affections from the old and decadent order to the new ideal held up before them.

Mazzini's conception of nationality, like his idea of humanity was also essentially correct. The terms he uses to express the concept Nationality are perfect, none better has yet been discovered. Nationality, he says, is the Conscience of the peoples, their Individuality. It is this which assigns to different groups of human units, constituting a nation, their special function in Humanity, their special mission among mankind. This is Mazzini's conception of Nationality and the most modern conception of it has made no advance upon the Mazzinian idea. Yet it seems very doubtful if even Mazzini had fully realised the significance of his own definition of nationality.

Nationality, he says, is the individuality of the people. The comparatively recent researches both in psychology and sociology have, imparted a complexity and completeness to the conception of individuality which it never had in Mazzini's days. The individuality of a man or woman is that undeniable but inexplicable something which differentiates him or her from other men and women. This something is original and organic in the individual. It is not explained by anything that is or can be known concerning the individual. Neither heredity nor environment, which seem to explain a lot, can fully explain these individual differentiations. Children of the same parent, brought up in the same way, influenced by the same environments, whether physical, intellectual, or moral, develop different individualities of their own. All that we can say is that there is something original and organic in the very make and constitution of different human beings which differentiate them from other human beings, and constitute the essential elements of their individuality. Psychometry is engaged in discovering, if possible, the physical basis of human character or individuality. Psychology is investigating the same elements in the mental constitution of the individual. And though the origin and cause of the human individuality lies still, as perhaps it will always do, in the realm of the unknown, its constituent elements are being discovered more and more fully almost every day. This individuality, we now fully recognise, expresses itself, in the first place, in the physical make and movement of different human beings. The general physiological structure is practically the same among all men belonging to any particular race or nation. But there are almost endless variations within this general unity, of physiological types, almost every individual differing from others on some points, either in the angle of the nose, the formation of the cranium, or the pigment of the skin. Thus, among even the white races, some are blonde, some brunette, some have sharp and some flat features. In some the forehead is broad, the lips thin, eyes large, the nose straight; in others the cranium has a suggestion of conicality, the lips thick, the nose broad, eyes small, and the whole appearance has the impress of the criminal and the vicious on it. These physiological differences are oftentimes indicative of moral and mental differences as well. But even without any marked physiological distinctions, there are fundamental intellectual differences between one man and another, belonging not only to the same race or nation, or the same social set, but even born of the same parents. These differences are as original and organic as the differences in their physiological structures. Similarly, there are moral differences between different individuals. All these are what may be called structural differences, undeniable but inexplicable. And these structural differences really constitute the fundamental basis of what we call the human personality or character.

In defining nationality as the individuality of peoples, Mazzini struck an essentially right note. But what was a happy intuition with him is to-day almost a scientific truth. And this larger and fuller conception of nationality which we claim is only the result of the advance of our age over that of the great Italian apostle of Nationalism.

HIGH COURT OUTRAGE

Birendra Nauth Dutta Gupta, aged 19 years, who is charged with the murder of Deputy Superintendent Shams-ul Alum, was placed on his trial at the High Court Sessions on the 1st before the Chief Justice and a special jury composed of five Europeans and four Indians.

The prisoner who looked pale but calm and unconcerned entered the dock lanthling. He was barefooted and was dressed in a bhoori which originally was white and had a warm wrapper thrown over the upper part of his body. The court was strongly guarded by police under the supervision of Superintendent Haultain.

AFTER HEARING THE EVIDENCE.

The jury without retiring unanimously found the accused guilty of murder.

His Lordship in passing sentence said:—

Birendra Nath Dutta Gupta, you have been found guilty by the unanimous verdict of the jury of the murder of Moulvi Shams-ul Alum, and the sentence of the court is that you will be taken from this place to the place whence you come and next to the place of execution and there to be hanged by the neck until you are dead.

RAJENDRAPUR TRAIN DACOITY CASE.

Surendra Chandra Chakrabarty, an inhabitant of Madhyapara in Bikrampur, has been arrested at Habiganj and brought to Dacca, under police escort. This arrest, too, is understood to be in connection with Rajendrapur train dacoity.

The Public Prosecutor, applying for two day's time to produce more identifying witnesses, the hearing of arguments for bail on behalf of Sitanath Das, a Dacca College student, arrested in connection with Rajendrapur train dacoity case, has been postponed to the 28th instant.

TENALI BOMB CASE.

At the High Court, Justices Benson and Abdul Rahim delivered two separate and distinct judgments in the appeal preferred by Chukkerpulle Ramia, one of the accused in the Tenali Bomb case. The accused was convicted by the Sessions Judge of murder and sentenced to death. Mr. Justice Benson in a lengthy judgment confirmed the conviction under Section 302 and the sentence of death. Mr. Justice Adhur Rahim also delivered a lengthy judgment altering the conviction and sentencing the appellant to three year's rigorous imprisonment. Owing to this difference of opinion the case will be referred to a third Judge.

THE TENTH JATA.

Since the arrest of ten men of the 10th Jata about a fortnight ago, with rumours of various descriptions have been prevalent in Calcutta about the affairs of the regiment. We cannot yet give the nature of the charges against the arrested men but we can say that none of very alarmist rumours were true. So far as we can learn the regiment was at no time deprived of its arms and certainly the Volunteers were not served ball ammunition yesterday.

The Tenth Jata generally are a fine body of soldiers who hail from the Upper Provinces and while the rumours have been spreading they have been quietly getting their belongings together to be ready for unexpected departure. On Saturday last one Havildar and thirty men of the 24th Punjabis took charge of the Lines and early this morning the 10th Jata leave by boat for Sind.

Out of the ten men who had been arrested originally three were shortly after released and five more since, making a total of eight. Of the two remaining a Havildar named Choonsee and a sepoy named Surjan have been sentenced by Court Martial to one year's imprisonment.

In the regiment itself enquiries go to show that there is much defection at the stigma cast on the good name of the regiment by the presence of sedition to even so small an extent among their ranks. The men declare that they are not at all sorry to leave Calcutta but feel the disgrace of the circumstances that have led to their being sent away. They also point out that since only ten men were arrested and two actually sentenced they might not to be condemned in public estimation as a body for the deeds or actions of so small a proportion of their number.

MADRAS GLASS FACTORY.

On the 23rd January a demonstration was given of the capability of the Madras glass factory recently installed in its works to turn out glassware and the ladies and gentlemen who attended were conducted round the works by Messrs. A very interesting time was spent by all present.

KICK FOR KICK.

An incident took place at the Lucknow Railway Station on the 23rd January. A Bengali Vakil, in Bengali dress, was buying a ticket when one of the three tourists, six feet high, went up, and finding the ticket window occupied, hauled out and kicked the Vakil. This gentleman got his head out of the window, looked at the offender squarely in the face, repeated the operation on the tourist and then asked what he meant. The tourist growled at him fiercely. The Vakil returned it more fiercely and that silenced the offender.

A NASIK SUSPECT.

One Bhasker Ganesh was placed before the third Magistrate by Inspector Sullivan of the Criminal Investigation Department who informed His Worship that the accused was arrested in Bombay on Friday last in connection with the Nasik tragedy. It appears that Bhasker was a student at the Victoria Jubilee Technical Institute and that he completed his course at the Institute in December last, passing as a Mechanical Engineer. He then went to Nasik and was arrested on suspicion on his return to Bombay on Friday. His Worship remanded the accused into Police custody till Monday for enquiry.

LAHORE SEDITION.

The hearing of the Lahore sedition cases was resumed after the Mohurram holidays by Mr. Harrison, Special Magistrate.

Zial Hug, Editor of "Peshwa," who was tried under Section 124A, tendered an apology which was forwarded to Government.

Ishri Pershad, Editor of the "Bedari," against whom there was a case of defamation instituted by the police also tendered on apology which was forwarded to the Inspector-General of Police. A charge was already framed against the accused.

In connection with the Lahore sedition case, Mr. Kelkar, Editor of the "Marhatta" was examined before the City Magistrate. The examination was regarding the reproduction in the "Marhatta" or other Indian papers of an article by William Jennings Bryan entitled "British rule in India" published in the New York "Sun" dated July 29th 1906. Witness in reply stated that he reproduced the article for which he was neither warned nor prosecuted as far as he remembered. The "Hindu," the "Madras Standard" the "Bengalee," and the "Patrika" of Calcutta also reproduced the article. The "Sun" of New York and "India" of London were received by witness in exchange for the past twelve years, the former very irregularly except if sent by any interested party. Witness had no personal knowledge of the article being distributed at the Calcutta Congress in pamphlet form. This closed the examination and the evidence will be submitted through the District Magistrate to the Lahore Court.

PATIALA SEDITION CASE.

When the Special Tribunal, hearing the Patiala Sedition case, assembled this morning in the Maharaja's courtroom, the President intimated to the defence pleaders that the Maharaja's orders on the petition, filed by accused, praying for the Maharaja's clemency, had not been received yet and that they intended telegraphing to His Highness for instruction. In the meantime the case was postponed indefinitely.

Lala Munshiram, a defence pleader, made a complaint that the police were refusing to sign the list of things which were being returned to the accused. Court promised to look into the matter.

Three applications for bail were made, but no orders passed.

THE HIGH COURT TRAGEDY.

Developments of an important character have taken place since the perpetration of the recent High Court outrage. Tuesday at midnight the Police raided three houses in the northern section of the town. About 1-30 a. m. on Thursday Superintendent Creagan assisted by Inspector Mulcahy of the Jorabagan Police Station, Inspector Pandit of the Kumartuli Police Station and a posse of Policemen raided premises No. 275 Upper Chitpur Road occupied by one Hemanto Kumar Chatterjee and his family. The Police, who were armed with the necessary warrant in the course of a thorough search of the premises arrested the doctor's nephew, Babu Jotindra Nath Mukerjee who lived in the house with his wife and two children and who has been employed in the Bengal Secretariat as a shorthand writer under the Hon. Mr. Wheeler, Financial Secretary to the Government of Bengal. The Police seized a lot of letters, post cards, books and two photographs, one was that of Babu Deben-dro Nath Dey, late a teacher in the Calcutta Central College, the other being a group of about 28 students of the College including the teacher who is now employed as the headmaster of the Jheria High School. The search which was concluded about 7 a. m. was supervised by Mr. Tegart Deputy Commissioner of Police. Before the Police withdrew, the room of Jotindra Nath was locked up by the Police as Superintendent Creagan intimated that he intended continuing the search, meanwhile a constable was placed on special guard duty outside the room which is situated on the upper storey of the house while another constable was placed on guard at the gate of the house.

Simultaneously with the above search, the Police, headed by Inspector Lyons raided premises No. 59 Beniatolla Lane occupied by Jotindra Nath's uncle Babu Anath Bundo Chatterjee. This gentleman, it is said, had under the direction of the Translator to the Government of Bengal translated into English the Bengali documents which had been made exhibits in the well-known Ahpur

Bombay case. Apart from this he is said to be the Calcutta agent to the Maharaja of Nuda and looks after the Maharaja's houses in Calcutta besides doing work on commission. The Police on arriving at his house knocked at the gate which was bolted from within with wooden bar. As no response was made by the inmates, who were fast asleep, the Police, it is alleged, broke open the gate and entered the premises where a thorough search was made. These premises were also visited by Mr. Tegart during the search which resulted in the seizure of the Maharaja's account books and correspondence. The Police on withdrawing from the house marched off with Anath Babu, who, it is said, has been detained in custody.

The Police also searched premises No. 121 Cornwallist St. which, it is said, are in the occupation of Babu Kishori Lal Sarkar, who is said to be a Vakil of the High Court. Our representative visited the house but could get no details of the search, the inmates being warned by the Police not to speak to any one about the search. It is reported that an arrest was made but even in this respect no reliable information could be obtained. It is said that these searches are in a measure connected with the recent High Court outrage.

Two arrests were made in connection with the Alum murder at Krishnagar, namely, Lalit Kumar Chatterjee, pleader and Law Lecturer in the local College and his clerk. They were arrested by Inspector Hughes of the Armed Police and Rai Bahadur Benode Kumar Gupta of the C. I. D., on a charge of abetment of murder. The Warrant was signed by the District Magistrate and the two persons were taken by the police to him. Several pleaders appeared before the Magistrate and prayed for bail. They were told that the arrests were made under the orders of the Commissioner of Police, Calcutta to whom application should be made. Lalit and his clerk were sent to-day under police escort to Calcutta. Lalit's house was searched in the morning in the presence of his neighbours. A printed memorandum of association of the Arya Chemical Works and some songs were found. A month ago Lalit's house had been searched in connection with the Netra dacoity. The bail application has been sent by the Magistrate to the Commissioner of Police.

Honour the Lieutenant-Governor has awarded through the Commissioner of Police a sum of Rs. 1,000 to the persons who were instrumental in the arrest of the murderer, the amount will be distributed by the Commissioner of Police, Calcutta, to the persons concerned.

THE VICEROY'S SPEECH

His Excellency, the Viceroy delivered the following address of welcome at the first meeting of the reformed Imperial legislative Council:-

"GENTLEMEN,—

I welcome the members of this newly-constituted Imperial Council on their first assembly at the capital of the Indian Empire.

The occasion is replete with political meaning. It marks the close of a system of administration which, under the guidance of many illustrious statesmen, has contributed much to the prosperity of India and to the glories of her history—it opens a new era with the inauguration of broader principles of government,—and though this Council Room is ill-adapted for the accommodation of our increased numbers and for the convenience of the public, it has seemed best to me that we should first assemble within the walls of the palace which Wellesly founded and in the Council Chamber hallowed by the legislative traditions of the last 100 years.

Those years have witnessed the consolidation of the Indian Empire as it exists to-day, they tell a story of troubles and anxieties, of hard-won successes and many glorious episodes—but they have throughout been years of recurring administrative changes in harmony with social progress and an advance in political thought largely due to the results of an education system introduced into India by British rulers.

It has been a period of evolution. We have moved in successive stages from Wellesly's small Supreme Council appointed by the Board of Control—to the days of Lord William Bentinck and the Charter Act of 1833—to the conquering rule of Lord Dalhousie and the Charter Act of 1853—to the Council Acts of 1861 and 1892—great landmarks in Indian history. And each successive stage has witnessed either the grant of larger legislative powers to the Government of India or an increasing recognition of the necessity for broadening the basis of administration upon lines more representative of the general interests of the country. That necessity was first met by the nomination, and subsequently the quasi-election, of additional members of the Governor-General's Council. The first additional member was appointed nearly 80 years ago under the Act of 1833. That member was Lord Macaulay. Since then the machinery affecting their appointment has been gradually adapted to meet varying conditions, whilst their numbers were increased to a possible sixteen by the Act of 1892. That Act like its predecessors has been superseded by the adoption of more advanced legislation and in accordance with the Act of 1909 this newly-constituted Imperial Council is now for the first time assembled.

I have merely ventured to sketch the progress of British legislation, because I cannot but feel that much of the criticism of the recent policy of the Government of India has been oblivious of past history and has been based upon the assumption that the India of 20 years ago can continue to be the India of to-day. That is an impossibility. Many influences have combined to make it so—and we have had to follow in the footsteps of the statesmen who have preceded us, and to recognise that British rule must again be re-adapted to novel conditions,—conditions far more novel than any with which our predecessors had to deal in that political forces unknown to them have come into existence in India which is no longer possible for British administrators to ignore, whilst the trend of events in the Far East has accentuated the ambitions of Eastern populations. When I took up the reins of government as Viceroy in the late autumn of 1905 all Asia was marvelling at the victories of Japan over a European power, their effects were far-reaching.

new possibilities seemed to spring into existence—there were indications of popular demands in China, in Persia, in Egypt, and in Turkey, there was an awakening of the Eastern World, and though, to outward appearances, India was quiet,—in the sense that there was at that moment no visible acute political agitation,—she had not escaped the general infection, and before I had been in the country a year I shared the view of my Colleagues that beneath a seemingly calm surface there existed a mass of smothered political discontent, much of which was thoroughly justifiable, and due to causes which we were called upon to examine. We heartily recognised the loyalty of the masses of the people of India and we were not prepared to suppress new, but not unnatural, aspirations without examination. You cannot sit forever on a safety valve, no matter how sound the boiler may be. Something had to be done and we decided to increase the powers and expand the scope of the Act of 1892.

It is important that my Hon'ble Colleagues and the Indian public should know the history, the early history at any rate, of the reforms which have now been sanctioned by Parliament. They had their genesis in a note of my own addressed to my Colleagues in August 1906 nearly 3½ years ago. It was based entirely on the views I had myself formed of the position of affairs in India. It was due to no suggestions from home—whether it was good or bad, I am entirely responsible for it. It dealt with the conditions it appeared to me the Government of India had then to consider, and as it is answerable for much that has followed in its wake, my Hon'ble Colleagues will perhaps allow me to read it to them. This is what I then wrote.

"I feel sure my Colleagues will agree with me that Indian affairs and the methods of Indian administration have never attracted more public attention in India and at home than at the present moment. The reasons for their doing so are not far to seek. The growth of education which British rule has done so much to encourage is bearing fruit. Important classes of the population are learning to realise their own position to estimate for themselves their own intellectual capacities and to compare their claims for an equality of citizenship with those of a ruling race, whilst the directing influences of political life at home are simultaneously in full accord with the advance of political thought in India.

"To what extent the people of India as a whole are as yet capable of serving in all branches of administration to what extent they are individually entitled to a share in the political representation of their country, to what extent it may be possible to weld together the traditional sympathies and antipathies of many different races and different creeds, and to what extent the great hereditary rulers of Native States should assist to direct Imperial policy, are problems which the experience of future years can alone gradually solve.

"But we, the Government of India, cannot shut our eyes to present conditions. The political atmosphere is full of change, questions are before us which we cannot afford to ignore and which we must attempt to answer, and to me it would appear all-important that the initiative should emanate from us, that the Government of India, should not be put in the position of appearing to have its hands forced by agitation in this country or by pressure from home that we should be the first to recognise surrounding conditions and to place before His Majesty's Government the opinions which personal experience and a close touch with the every-day life of India entitle us to hold.

"This view I feel sure my colleagues share with me. Mr. Morley cordially approves it and in pursuance of it announced, on my authority in his recent Budget speech my intention of appointing a Committee from the Viceroy's Council to consider the question of possible reforms.

taken place before—there was the Commission, over which Sir Charles Aitchison presided, to enquire into the employment of Indians in the public services, and we have also the notable report of the Committee appointed by Lord Dufferin to consider proposals for the reconstruction of Legislative Councils on a representative basis (1888), over which Sir George Chesney presided, and of which the present Lord Macdonnell was Secretary. It is curious to see from that report how similar conditions and arguments were then, to what they are now; with the one great exception that we have now to deal with a further growth of nearly twenty years of increasing political aspirations.

"But though increased representation is still the popular cry as it was in 1884, other demands or rather suggestions are shaping themselves out of a foreshadowed metamorphosis. We are told of a Council of Princes, of an Indian Member of the Viceroy's Executive Council, of an Indian Member on the Secretary of State's Council, and in addition to the older claims put forward on behalf of increased representation on the Legislative Councils, we are asked to consider new procedure as to presentation of the Budget to the Viceroy's Legislative Council, a prolongation of the Budget Debate and further opportunity for financial discussion. As to possibilities such as these, I would be grateful for the opinion of the Committee I hope to appoint, limiting myself for the present to only one opinion that in any proposal for the increase of representation it is absolutely necessary to guard the important interests existing in the country, as expressed in paragraph 7, page 3, of the Report of Sir Charles Aitchison's Committee.

- (a) the interests of the landed nobility and landed classes who have a great permanent stake in the country;
- (b) the interests of the trading, professional and agricultural classes;
- (c) the interests of the planting and commercial European community; and
- (d) the interests of stable and effective administration.

"The objects I should propose to refer to the Committee are—(a) A Council of Princes, and if this is not possible, might they be represented on the Viceroy's Legislative Council?"

(b) An Indian Member of the Viceroy's Council.

(c) Increased representation on the Legislative Council of the Viceroy and on Local Government.

(4) Prolongation of the Budget Debate. Procedure as to presentation of the Budget and powers of moving amendments.

"This Minute is circulated for the information of Members of Council, from whom I shall be glad to receive my suggestions to expressions of opinion which they may desire to make, and which will be communicated to the Committee."

"When the Committee has reported, their Report will be laid before Council for full consideration."

That note elicited valuable opinions and was fully discussed in Council; and though, as you are aware, its suggestions were not accepted in their entirety by the Government of India, it laid the foundation of the first scheme of reform they submitted to the Secretary of State.

Since it was written, Lord Morley has fought India's battles in both Houses of the Parliament in many great and memorable speeches, and there has been a constant interchange of correspondence between him and the Government of India. Much of it has not as yet been made public, but as regards the reform of the Legislative Councils I commit no touch of confidence in indicating the steps which the Government of India has endeavoured to follow. We have distinctly maintained that representative Government in its Western sense is totally inapplicable to the Indian Empire and would be uncongential to the traditions of Eastern populations; that Indian conditions do not admit of popular representation; that the safety and welfare of this country must depend on the supremacy of British administration;—and that supremacy can, in no circumstances, be delegated to any kind of representative assembly.

But we have been deeply impressed by the changing political conditions alluded to in my note, and we have endeavoured to meet them by broadening the representation authorised by the Council Act of 1892, by expanding its rules of procedure and facilitating opportunities for debate, by inviting the leaders of Indian public opinion to become fellow-workers with us in British administration, and by securing the representation of those important interests and communities which go to form the real strength of India, whilst at the same time recognising the claims of educational advance. We have borne in mind the hopes held out to the people of India in Queen Victoria's Proclamation of 1858.

We have felt that the political atmosphere of a bureaucracy may become close and confined, and that the admittance of outside air is beneficial to its health and strength. We have aimed at the reform and enlargement of our Councils but not at the creation of Parliaments. I emphasise what I have just said in view of the opinions to which advanced India politicians appear not unfrequently to commit themselves.

The machinery of our scheme was explained in our Resolution of November 15th. There is no necessity for me to analyse it, it has already been fully discussed by the public. We by no means claim perfection for it, we know that there will be much to learn from experience of its working and that it may require alteration in the future, but if I have judged Indian public opinion correctly, the verdict has been in our favour in admitting the necessity for administrative changes and the general soundness of the lines we have followed. Of course we have met with many criticisms. It would have been unfortunate indeed, if a scheme of vast political moment had not elicited discussion and diversity of opinion. But there is one criticism which I refuse to accept—the suggestion that the Councils Act of 1909 is the result of concessions to seditious agitation. There is no foundation for any such assumption—unless the recognition of the political condition of India in 1906, as I have endeavoured to describe it, is to be reckoned as a concession—though it was a recognition of the necessity for which no responsible administrators could disregard. The murders at Muzafferpore were the first of the political crimes which have horrified all India, and they were perpetrated 1½ years after my Councils Committee had commenced to formulate their reform proposals. Then came the Manicktollah Garden discoveries, followed at intervals by a repitition of outrages numerous in their origin. Was the Government of India in the face of those outrages, and on account of them, to renounce the conclusions they had deliberately come to and to throw overboard their scheme for reform? Were they to be frightened by an anarchical plot out of a policy they had deliberately adopted? I absolutely refuse to admit that the just aspirations of the loyal subjects of the King-Emperor should be jeopardised by traitorous conspirators. That is a concession I will not agree to.

But it is unfortunately too true that the progress of the work upon which we have been engaged, and in the completion of which we hoped to confer a welcome boon upon the people of India, has been shared by a succession of abominable crimes which have forced my Government into one repressive measure after another. And yesterday, on the eve of the assembly of this Council, a faithful and gallant public servant was brutally murdered within the precincts of the High Court and in the broad light of day. A spirit hitherto unknown to India has come into existence, spirit opposed to all the teaching of Indian religion and traditions, a spirit of anarchy and lawlessness which seeks to subvert not only British rule but the governments of Indian Chiefs, to whom I am so deeply indebted for their loyal assistance. We are called upon to deal with subterranean machinations, and methods of assassinations, and robbery, dangerous to the public safety and discreditable to the fair fame of associations which are doing their best to inveigle into their meshes the youth of the country poisoned by the dissemination of revolutionary literature, which, out of a chivalrous unwillingness to interfere with any form of freedom of speech, British administrations have tolerated for too long. Present dangers we are prepared to meet, and the moral training of the rising generation our duty will no longer allow us to neglect. We can no longer tolerate the preachings of a revolutionary press. We are determined to bridle literary license. I am glad to believe that the support of an enlarged Council will go far to assure the Indian public of the soundness of any measures we may deem it right to introduce.

71, Chowringhee CALCUTTA.

I had hoped to open this new Chapter under an unclouded political sky. No one has longed more earnestly than I have to allow bygones to be bygones and to commence a new administrative era with a clean slate. The course of recent events has cancelled the realisation of those hopes, and I can but assert that the first duty of every government is to maintain the observance of the law,—to provide for the present, and as far it can for the future welfare of the populations committed to its charge, to rule, and, if need be, to rule with a strong hand.

But, gentlemen, though I have no wish to disguise from you the anxieties of the moment, I do not for an instant admit that the necessity of ruthlessly eradicating a great evil from our midst should throw more than a passing shadow over the general political situation in India. I believe that situation to be better than it was five years ago. We must not allow immediate dangers to blind us to the evidence of future promise.

I believed that the broadening of political representation has saved India from far greater troubles than those we have now to face. I am convinced that the enlargement of our administrative machinery has enormously strengthened the hands of the Viceroy and of the Government of India, and has brought factors to our aid which would otherwise have had no sympathy with us. I believe above all that the fellowship of British and Indian administrators under a supreme British Government is the key to the future political happiness of this country. It is in that belief that I have worked hard for India, and when I see around me to-day the representatives of the powerful communities and interests, for whom I pleaded in my note, I feel convinced that the dignity and good sense of this Council will be worthily maintained, and that the navigation of Indian ship of state will be loyally and ably assisted.

And now that my tenure of my high office is drawing to a close; I hope I may feel that my years of work have borne some fruit, and I am grateful to Providence in that He has spared me to be present on this great historical occasion.

HON'BLE MR. SINHA'S SPEECH.

The Hon'ble Mr. S. P. Sinha said:—I beg to give notice that at the next meeting of the Council I shall propose certain amendments in the rules for the Legislative business of the Council of the Governor-General. A copy of the existing Rules together with the proposed amendments and statements of objects and reasons for those amendments has been placed on the table before each Hon'ble member and to-day I desire to make two remarks with regard to those proposed amendments. First, that Rules for the conduct of legislative business are, hon. members will notice, entirely distinct from the rules which have been made by the Governor-General in Council—that is the Executive Council—namely, the Rules for the discussion of the Financial Statement and Rules for the asking of questions. The Rules are made by the Governor-General in Council and has nothing to do with them. The Rules we now seek to make are Rules for the conduct of legislative business properly so called. The second remark which I desire to place before the Council is this:—The amendments which we propose are of a purely formal nature and are intended to adopt the existing Rules to the altered conditions of the present Council. For example, in the old Council members used to make their speeches sitting. With a council of sixty Additional members it will be almost impossible for members to hear a speaker if he were to speak while retaining his seat so that we propose to alter that and make it a rule subject of course to the Legislative Council passing it—that members henceforth should stand when making their speeches. The other alterations are more or less of the same character. We considered that it was not desirable to make any substantial change on the Rules before one had a longer and long experience of the existing Rules which, if I may venture to say so, have worked very well so far as the old Council is concerned. I hope hon. Members will agree with me that it is inadvisable and inexpedient to make any change in the existing Rules before we have some practical experience of the working of the Rules. I merely mention these observations in order that hon'ble members may feel that we are not proposing any drastic changes in the existing Rules of Business.

Council then adjourned to Friday, the 28th instant.

Cheap Edition of KARMAYOGIN.

The difficulty felt by many students and educated men of small means in buying the KARMAYOGIN
at its ordinary price of two annas, has been so much pressed on our attention
that we have found it necessary to bring out a cheaper edition at one anna a copy.
It is not an easy thing in this country to establish a weekly review of this standard written in English,
and it has therefore been necessary for us at the outset to place a price on the paper which should ensure its being self-supporting even with a limited circulation. The KARMA-
YOGIN, however, is now
sufficiently successful to allow of a concession of this kind being made without financial injury. The subscribers to the superior edition will be compensated
by the superior get-up and paper, while the cheaper edition will remove the grievance of the large number who have hitherto been debarred from reading the review by their scanty
means.

Vedantic Art.

The progress a new tendency or a new movement is making can be measured by the amount of opposition it meets, and it is encouraging to note that the revival of Indian Art is exciting intellectual opponents to adverse criticism. Mr. Vincent Smith, a solid and well-equipped scholar and historian but not hitherto noted as an art-critic, recently lectured on Indian Art, ancient and modern. It is not surprising that he should find little to praise in the characteristic Vedantic Art of our country and seek to limit its excellence to a few masterpieces. Neither is it surprising that he should object to the revival of the national traditions as restoring Brahminic separateness from the traditions of the rest of the world. These are arguments that are as obvious as they are superficial. But it is strange to find him basing his opinion of the inferiority of the Vedantic style on its appeal not being universal. This merely means that the Vedantic motive and conventions are new to the European mind, and the average eye, enslaved to old associations, cannot immediately welcome what is new and ill-understood. Every new step forward in artistic tradition within Europe itself has been met by the same limited comprehension and has had to get the assent first of the trained and sensitive taste and then of the average mind before it could be said to be universally recognised. The real question is whether the Vedantic style has anything in it that is true, deep and universal, whether it has a motive, a power of interpretation, a success in making Truth reveal itself in form, such as will ensure its conquest of prejudices based purely on inability to receive or welcome new impressions. The answer to that crucial question cannot be doubtful. Vedantic Art reveals spirit, essential truth, the soul in the body, the lasting type or idea in the mutable form with a power and masterly revelation of which European art is incapable. It is therefore sure to conquer Europe as steadily as Indian thought and knowledge are conquering the hard and narrow materialism of the nineteenth century.

Asceticism and Enjoyment.

Small things are often indicative of great and far-reaching tendencies. While glancing at the Modern Review,—always the best worth perusal of our Indian monthlies,—our attention was arrested by a slight illustrated article on Railways in India and America. The writer contrasts the squalor, indigence and discomfort of railway travelling in this Paradise of the efficient Anglo-Indian with the lavish comfort and opulence of railway furnishings and appointments in the United States. The contrast is indicative of the immense gulf between the teeming wealth of America and the miserable indigence of India, once the richest country in the world. America is the land above all lands where enjoyment, bhoga, is frankly recognized and accepted. India, many would say, is the land above all lands where bhoga is sternly refused. That is the common view; we are not inclined to think it the correct view. The asceticism of India is a phase, a characteristic of a civilisation dominated by an unfavourable environment and driven in upon itself. The classical period when India was full of life, activity, development, abounding vigour, defending herself successfully against the impact of the outer barbarian, was a period of frank and lavish enjoyment far more intellectual, artistic, perfect than any thing Europe has ever been capable of, even at its best. In yet older literature we find the true spirit of India, a splendid capacity for bhoga and tyaga in their highest terms, the utter enjoyment of the householder, the utter renunciation of the sannyasin. To take the utmost joy of life, to be capable of the utmost renunciation of life, at one and the same time, in the same mind and body, to be master of both capacities and bound by neither,—this was the secret of India, the mighty discipline of which Janaka was the traditional exemplar. "Renounce all that thou mayest enjoy all,"—this is India's characteristic message,—not Buddha's absolute renunciation, not the European's enslavement to his bodily, vital and intellectual desires and appetites. Tyaga within, bhoga without,—ananda, the divine delight of the purified soul, embracing both.

Allens in Ancient India.

We extract elsewhere a brief article on the above subject from the December Indian Review for which we had no space in our former issues. The ancient Indian treatment of foreign residents forms a curious contrast to the spirit of exclusion which is growing upon modern nations. We have our own doubts about that little privilege of exemption from suits for debt which Mr. Hayavadana Rau mentions with appreciation; it would obviously place the alien merchant at a disadvantage when compared with the scrupulous honesty of the Indian traders, and we are not sure that it may not have been a subtle stroke of Chanakyalike diplomacy to coddle the resident foreign middleman out of existence while favouring the non-resident importer. The chief importance of the article is, however, the incidental light it throws on the organisation of life in ancient India. We are too apt to forget how noble, great and well-appointed a life it was. There were no railways, telegraphs or steamships, it is true, and democracy was beginning to go out of fashion in favour of a centralised bureaucratic monarchy. But in spite of these drawbacks, the ancient life of India was as splendid, as careful, as convenient, as humane, as enlightened in its organisation as that of any modern society or administration.

The Scholarship of Mr. Risley.

We are not concerned with the political issues of Mr. Risley's great oratorical effort in connection with the Press Bill, for we have no need politics; but Mr. Risley as a scholar falls within our province, and we can only hope our remarks on that subject will not expose us to the provision against bringing officials into contempt. Even at that risk we must take leave to say that we can only hope Mr. Risley's ethnological science is less remarkably muddled than his knowledge of Indian civilisation and literature. In his exhortation to Indian womanhood to stand fast to its ancient moorings he jumbles together Swayamvaras, the rape of the Sabines and Shacuntala in a miraculous fashion! At no Swayamvara that we are aware of, did the women come forward as peacemakers between the abducting hero and the disappointed suitors. Mr. Risley has been misled by pitchforking his early memories of Roman history into Indian epic and narrative. And need we say that there was neither Swayamvara, nor fighting nor peacemaking in the story of Shacuntala? This is the first time, moreover, that a startled Indian public has been pointed to Shacuntala as the ideal Hindu woman. Sita, Draupadi, Savitri, Damayanti,—these are familiar to us as ideals, but Shacuntala is Mr. Risley's own addition. To us she is a beautiful poetic creation, not an exemplar of feminine conduct. We observe that the Bengalee is full of admiration for Mr. Risley's poetic rapture over Shacuntala. We do not know whom we should congratulate more, the poet of the Press Bill or his admirer.

Anarchism.

Are we not entitled, by the way, in the interests of the English language, to protest against the misapplication of the word Anarchists to the Indian Terrorists and Anarchism to their policy? Their methods are wild and lawless, their effort is to create anarchy; but Anarchism and Anarchist are terms which imply something very different, a thing as yet unknown either in practice or in theory to India. The Irish Fenians did the same things as the Indian Terrorists are now practising, but nobody ever called them Anarchists; to misapply this term is to bring anarchy into the modern use of language. It is doubtful whether any Indian who has not been to Europe, really knows what Anarchism is. Philosophically, it is the negation of the necessity of government; in practice, it is often the use of assassination to destroy all government irrespective of its nationality or nature. Democracy is as abhorrent to the Anarchist as Czarism, a national government as intolerable as the government of the foreigner. All government is to him an interference with the liberty of the individual, and he sets out to assassinate Czar or democratic President, constitutional king or imperial Caesar with a terrible impartiality, an insane logic. For if we ask him how liberty of any kind except the liberty of the strong to prey on the weak can exist in the absence of government, he will probably answer that by right education, right ideas and right feelings will be established and the spirit of brotherhood will prevent the abuse of liberty, and if anyone infringes this unwritten law, he must be destroyed as if he were a noxious wild beast. And by a parallel logic he seeks to destroy all the living symbols of a state of society which stands in the way of the coming of his millennium.

The Gita and Terrorism.

Mr. Risley repeats a charge we have grown familiar with, that the Gita has been misused as a gospel of Terrorism. We cannot find any basis for this accusation except the bare fact that the teaching of the Gita was part of the education given by Upendranath Banerji in the Maniktola garden. There is no evidence to show that its tenets were used to justify a gospel of Terrorism. The only doctrine of the Gita the Terrorist can pervert to his use, is the dictum that the Kshatriya must slay as a part of his duty and he can do it without sin if he puts egoism away and acts selflessly without attachment, in and for God, as a sacrifice, as an offering of action to the Lord of action. If this teaching is in itself false, there is no moral basis for the hero, the soldier, the judge, the king, the legislature which recognises capital punishment. They must all be condemned as criminals and offenders against humanity. It is undoubtedly true that since the revival of religious thought in India the Gita has ceased to be what Mr. Risley calls it, a transcendental philosophy, and has been made a rule of life. It is undoubtedly true that selflessness, courage, a live and noble activity have been preached as the kernel of the ethics of the Gita. That teaching has in no country been condemned as ignoble, criminal or subversive of morality, nor is a philosophy of any value to any sensible being if it is only transcendental and cannot be lived. We strongly protest against the brand of suspicion that has been sought to be placed in many quarters on the teaching and possession of the Gita,—our chief national heritage, our hope for the future, our great force for the purification of the moral weaknesses that stain and hamper our people.

THE THREE PURUSHAS.

The greatest of all the philosophical problems which human thought has struggled to solve, is the exact nature and relation to us of the conscious Intelligence in the phenomenal existence around. The idealist denies the phenomenal existence, the materialist denies the conscious Intelligence. To the former, phenomenon is a passing shadow on the luminous calm of the single universal Spirit; to the latter, intelligence is a temporary result of the motions of Matter. The idealist can give no satisfactory explanation of the existence of the shadow; he admits that it is inexplicable, a thing that is and yet is not: the materialist can give no satisfactory explanation of the existence of intelligence; he simply tries to trace the stages of its development and the methods of its workings, and covers over the want of an explanation by the abundant minuteness of his observations. But the soul of Man, looking out and in, is satisfied neither with Shankara nor with Haeckel. It sees the universal existence of phenomena, it sees the universal existence of Intelligence. It seeks a term which will admit both, cover both, identify both; it demands, not an elimination of either, but a reconciliation.

The Upanishads do not deny the reality of the world, but they identify it with Brahman who transcends it. He is the One without a second; He is the All. If all is Brahman, then there can be nothing but Brahman, and therefore the existence of the All, sarvam idam, does not contradict the unity of Brahman, does not establish the reality of bheda, difference. It is one Intelligence looking at itself from a hundred view-points, each point conscious of and enjoying the existence of the others. The shoreless stream of idea and thought, imagination and experience, name and form, sensation and vibration sweeps onward for ever, without beginning, without end, rising into view, sinking out of sight; through it the one Intelligence with its million self-expressions pours itself abroad, an ocean with innumerable waves. One particular self-expression may disappear into its source and continent, but that does not and cannot abolish the phenomenal universe. The One is for ever, and the Many are for ever because the One is for ever. So long as there is a sea, there will be waves.

In the oceanic stir and change of universal Nature, the soul or Purusha is the standing point, stable, unmoving, unchanging, eternal,—nityah sarvagatah sthanur achaloyam sanatanah. In the whole, the Purusha or soul is one,—there is One Spirit which supports the stir of the Universe, not many. In the individual the One Purusha has three stages of personality; He is One, but triple, trivrit. The Upanishads speak of two birds on one tree, of which one eats the fruit of the tree, the other, seated on a higher branch, does not eat but watches its fellow: one is isha or lord of itself, the other is anisha, not lord of itself, and it is when the eater looks up and perceives the greatness of the watcher and fills himself with it that grief, death, subjection,—in one word maya, ignorance, and illusion, ceases to touch him. There are two unborn who are male and one unborn who is female; she is the tree with its sweet and bitter fruit, the two are the birds. One of the unborn enjoys her sweetness, the other has put it away from him. These are the two Purushas, the akshara, or immutable spirit, and the kshara, or apparently mutable, and the tree or woman is Prakriti, universal Energy which the Europeans call Nature. The kshara purusha is the soul in nature and enjoying Nature, the akshara purusha is the soul above Nature and watching her. But there is One who is not seated on the tree, but occupies and possesses it, who is not only lord of Himself, but lord of all that is: He is higher than the kshara, higher than the akshara. He is Purushottama, the Soul one with God, with the All.

These three Purushas are described in the fifteenth chapters of the Gita. "There are two Purushas in the world, the akshara and the kshara,—the kshara is all creatures, the akshara is called Kutastha, the one on the summit. There is another Purusha, the highest (uttama), called also the Paramatma or Supreme Spirit, who enters into the three worlds, (the worlds of sushupti, swapna, jagrat, otherwise the causal, mental and physical planes of existence), and sustains them as the imperishable lord." And in the thirteenth chapter, while drawing the distinction between the lower Purusha and the higher, Sri Krishna defines more minutely the relations of God and the individual soul to Nature. "Prakriti is the basic source of cause, effect and agency; the Purusha, of the sense of enjoyment of happiness and grief; for it is the soul in Nature (Purusha in Prakriti) that enjoys the threefold workings of things caused by Nature, (the play of conservation, creation, and destruction; reception, rejection and resistance; illumination, misconception and obscuration; calm, work and inertia; all being different manifestations of three fundamental forces called the gunas or essential properties of Prakriti); and it is the attachment of the soul to the gunas that is the cause of births in bodies good and evil. The highest Purusha in this body is the one who watches, who sanctions, who enjoys, who upholds, who is the mighty Lord and the Supreme Soul."

The personality of the Supreme Soul is universal, not individual. Whatever is in all creatures, character, idea, imagination, experience, sensation, motion, is contained by Him as an object of spiritual enjoyment without limiting or determining Him. He is all things at once. Such an universality is necessary to support and supply individual existence, but it cannot be the determining limit of individual existence. Something has to be reserved, something put forward, and this partial manifestation is the individual. "It is verily an eternal part of Me that in the world of individual existence becomes the Jiva or individual." The Jiva or individual is the kshara purusha, and between him and the Supreme stands the akshara purusha, the bird on the summit of the tree, joyous in his own bliss, undisturbed by the play of Nature, impartially watching it, receiving its energies on his golden immutable existence without being for a moment bound or affected, eternally self-gathered, eternally free. This akshara purusha is our real self, our divine unity with God, our malleable freedom from that which is transient and changing. If it did not exist, there would be no escape from the bondage of life and death, joy and grief, sin and virtue; we should be prisoners in a cage without a door, beating our wings against the bars in vain for an exit; life and death, joy and grief, sin and virtue would be eternal, ineffable realities, not temporary rules determining the great game of life, and we should be unwilling actors, not free playmates of God able to suspend and renew the game when we will. It is by realising our oneness with the akshara purusha that we get freedom from ignorance, freedom from the cords of desire, freedom from the imperative law of works. On the other hand, if the akshara purusha were all, as the Sankhya philosophy contends, there would be no basis for different experience, no varying personality, every individual existence would be precisely like every other individual experience, the development and experience of one soul in Nature an exact replica of the development and experience of another soul. It is the kshara purusha who is all creatures, and the variety of experience, character and development is effected by a particular part of the universal swabhava or nature of conscious existence in phenomena being attached to a particular individual or jiva. This is what is meant by saying that it is a part of God which becomes the jiva. This swabhava, once determined, does not change; but it manifests various parts of itself, at various times, under various circumstances, in various forms of action and various bodies suited to the action or development it has to enjoy. It is for this reason that the purusha in Nature is called kshara, fluid, shifting, although it is not in reality fluid or shifting, but constant, eternal and immutable, sanatana. It is the variety of its enjoyment in Time, Space and Causality that makes it kshara. The enjoyment of the akshara purusha is self-existent, beyond Time, Space and Causality, aware of but undisturbed by the continual multitudinous flux and reflux of Prakriti. The enjoyment of Purushottami is both in Prakriti and beyond it, it embraces and is the reality of all experience and enjoyment.

Development is determined by the kshara purusha, but not conducted by him. It is Prakriti, the Universal Energy, that conducts development under the law of cause and effect, and is the true agent. The soul is not the agent, but the lord who enjoys the results of the action of his agent, Prakriti or Nature; only by his attachment to Prakriti he forgets himself and identifies himself with her so as to have the illusion of agency and, by thus forgetting himself, ceases to be lord of himself, becomes subject to Causality, imprisoned in Time and Space, bound by the work which he sanctions. He himself, being a part of God, is made in His image, of one nature with Him. Therefore what God is, he also is, only with limitation, subject to Time, Space and Causality, because he has, of his own will, accepted that bondage. He is the witness, and if he ceased to watch, the drama would stop. He is the source of sanction, and what he declares null and void, drops away from the development. He is the enjoyer, and if he became indifferent, that individual development would be arrested. He is the upholder, and if he ceased to sustain the adhara, the vehicle, it would fall and cease. He is the lord, and it is for his pleasure that Nature acts. He is the spirit, and matter is only his vehicle, his robe, his means of self-expression. But all his sanctions, refusals, behests act not at once not there and then, not by imperative absolute compulsion, but subject to lapse of time, change of place, working of cause to effect. The lapse may be brief or long, a moment or centuries; the change small or great, here or in another world; the working direct or indirect, with the rapid concentration of processes which men call a miracle or with the careful and laboured evolution in which every step is visibly ordered and deliberate; but so long as the jiva is bound, his lordship is limited and constitutional, not despotic and absolute. His sanction and signature are necessary, but it is the Lord, spiritual and temporal of his mind and body, the Commons in his external environment who do the work of the State, execute, administer, legislate.

The first step in self-liberation is to get rid of the illusion of agency, to realise that Nature acts, not the soul. The second is to remove the siege of phenomenal associations by surrendering lordship to God, leaving Him alone to uphold and sanction by the abdication of the independent use of these powers, offering up the privilege of the enjoyer to Him. All that is then left is the attitude of the akshara purusha, the free, blissful self-existence, watching the action of Prakriti, but outside it. The kshara withdraws into the akshara. When the sakshi or witness withdraws into God Himself, that is the utter liberation.

A SYSTEM OF NATIONAL EDUCATION.

CHAPTER I.

THE BASIS OF EDUCATION.

The true basis of education is the study of the human mind infant, adolescent and adult. Any system of education founded on theories of academical perfection, which ignores the instrument of study, is more likely to hamper and impair intellectual growth than to produce a perfect and perfectly equipped mind. For the educationist has to do, not with dead material like the artist or sculptor, but with an infinitely subtle and sensitive organism. He cannot shape an educational masterpiece out of human wood or stone; he has to work in the elusive substance of mind and respect the limits imposed by the fragile human body.

There can be no doubt that the educational system of Europe is a great advance on many of the methods of antiquity, but its defects are also palpable. It is based on an insufficient knowledge of human psychology, and it is only safe guarded in Europe from disastrous results by the refusal of the ordinary student to subject himself to the processes it involves, his habit of studying only so much as he must to avoid punishment or to pass an immediate test, his resort to active habits and vigorous physical exercise. In India the disastrous effects of the system on body, mind and character are only too apparent. The first problem in a national system of education is to give an education as comprehensive as the European and more thorough, without the evils of strain and cramming. This can only be done by studying the instruments of knowledge and finding a system of teaching which shall be natural, easy and effective. It is only by strengthening and sharpening these instruments to their utmost capacity that they can be made effective for the increased work which modern conditions require. The muscles of the mind must be thoroughly trained by simple and easy means; then, and not till then, great feats of intellectual strength can be required of them.

The first principle of true teaching is that nothing can be taught. The teacher is not an instructor or taskmaster, he is a helper and guide. His business is to suggest and not to impose. He does not actually train the pupil's mind, he only shows him how to perfect his instruments of knowledge and helps and encourages him in the process. He does not impart knowledge to him, he shows him how to acquire knowledge for himself. He does not call forth the knowledge that is within; he only shows him where it lies and how it can be habituated to rise to the surface. The distinction that reserves this principle for the teaching of adolescent and adult minds and denies its application to the child, is a conservative and unintelligent doctrine. Child or man, boy or girl, there is only one sound principle of good teaching. Difference of age only serves to diminish or increase the amount of help and guidance necessary, it does not change its nature.

The second principle is that the mind has to be consulted in its own growth. The idea of hammering the child into the shape desired by the parent or teacher is a barbarous and ignorant superstition. It is he himself who must be induced to expand in accordance with his own nature. There can be no greater error than for the parent to arrange beforehand that his son shall develop particular qualities, capacities, ideas, virtues, or be prepared for a prearranged career. To force the nature to abandon its own dharma is to do it permanent harm, mutilate its growth and deface its perfection. It is a selfish tyranny over a human soul and a wound to the nation, which loses the benefit of the best that a man could have given it and is forced to accept instead something imperfect, and artificial, second-rate, perfunctory and common. Every man has in him something divine, something his own, a chance of strength and perfection in however small a sphere, which God offers him to take or refuse. The task is to find it, develop it, use it. The chief aim of education should be to help the growing soul to draw out that in itself which is best and make it perfect for a noble use.

The third principle of education is to work from the near to the far, from that which is to that which shall be. The basis of a man's nature is almost always, in addition to his soul's past, his heredity, his surroundings, his nationality, his country, the soil from which he draws sustenance, the air which he breathes, the sights, sounds, habits to which he is accustomed. They mould him not the less powerfully because insensibly. From that then we must begin. We must not take up the nature by the roots from the Earth in which it must grow or surround the mind with images and ideas of a life which is alien to that in which it must physically move. If anything has to be brought in from outside, it must be offered, not forced on the mind. A free and natural growth is the condition of genuine development. There are souls which naturally revolt from their surroundings and seem to belong to another age and clime. Let them be free to follow their bent; but the majority languish, become empty, become artificial, if artificially moulded into an alien form. It is God's arrangement for mankind that they should belong to a particular nation, age, society, that they should be children of the past, possessors of the present, creators of the future. The past is our foundation, the present our material, the future our aim and summit. Each must have its due and natural place in a national system of education.

CONVERSATIONS OF THE DEAD.

I.
DINSHAH, PERIZADE.

DINSHAH:

Perizade, the shades of Iran were not so cool and sweet as these in our city of Mazinderan. The gardens that bloom on the banks of the river of peace are carpeted with lovelier and sweeter-scented flowers; and the birds that sing upon every tree and make the day melodious with the unearthly delight of their clamorous harmonies, are of so various a plumage and hue that one is content to satiate the eye with the softness and splendour without caring to know name and kind. Here for two thousand years we have tasted the bliss of the angels; but, I know not why, it seems to me that memories of Iran come back to my heart. The waters of the Jihun and the tents of the Tartars where the tribes of Afrasiab wander, Damascus the opulent, and our own cities, where the houses of our parents adjoined and we leaned from the balcony and talked in soft whispers, seem to me again desirable.

PERIZADE

I too would not mind returning to our old haunts. It is not that I am weary of Mazinderan, but something calls to me to have joy again that is mortal and fleeting, but not without its poignant sense of a swiftly-snatched and, perfect bliss. Yet Dinshah, two thousand years have passed and shall we not consider, before we go, what has come to the places we loved? Other men, other tongues, other manners may now possess them, and we should come as strangers into a world for which we are no longer fit.

DINSHAH.

I will go and see. Wait for me, Perizade.

II.

DINSHAH.

Perizade, Perizade, let us not return to earth, but remain for ever in Mazinderan. I have seen the earth and it is changed. How wise wert thou, my angel!

PERIZADE.

What didst thou see or hear, beloved?

DINSHAH.

I saw a world stripped of beauty. Mean and clumsy were the buildings, or pretentious and aimed at a false elegance. Miles of brick, with hardly a bit of green here and there, these are the cities. Ever a raucous roar goes up from them, the glint of furnaces and the clang of metal; a dull, vicious smoke clouds the sky, the gardens are blasted and there is no beauty in them. Men wear a hideous dress uglier than their joyless faces and awkward limbs. It is a world of barbarians; the gnomes have come up from under the earth to work in the sunlight.

PERIZADE.

Dinshah, this is sorrowful news, for go we must. Do you not know that these urgings are the signal?

DINSHAH.

Yes, my Perizade, but not to this hideousness did our hearts move us to resort, but to the towers and gardens of Iran.

PERIZADE.

It may be, Dinshah, that we go down to make the world once more what it was, a place of beauty, song and delight. Surely, if we enter into the world you describe, we shall not be content to leave it till it is utterly changed into the likeness of our desire.

DINSHAH.

I think you are right, Perizade, as you always are. Let us then arise and go.

CHAPTER XIII.

Meanwhile there was a great commotion in the high road in the capital. The noise went abroad that Sannyasins had plundered the revenue that was being despatched from the royal treasury to Calcutta. Then by order of the Government sepoy and spearmen sped on all sides to seize Sannyasins. Now at that time in that famine-stricken country there was no great number of real Sannyasins; for these ascetics live upon alms, and when people themselves get nothing to eat, there is not likely to be anyone to give alms to the mendicant. Therefore all the genuine ascetics had fled from the pinch of hunger to the country about Benares and Prayag. Only the Children wore the robe of the Sannyasin when they willed, abandoned it when abandonment was needed. Now too, many, seeing trouble abroad, left the dress of the ascetic. For this reason the hungry retainers of power, unable to find a Sannyasin anywhere, could only break the waterjars and cooking-pots of the householders and return with their empty bellies only half-filled. Satyananda alone would at no time leave his saffron robe.

At the moment when on the bank of that dark and murmurous rivulet, on the borders of the high road, at the foot of the tree on the water's verge, Kalyani lay still and Mohendra and Satyananda in each other's embrace were calling on God with streaming eyes, Jamadar Nazir-ud-din and his sepoy arrived at the spot. Forthwith he put his hand on Satyananda's throat and said, "Here is a rascal of a Sannyasin." Immediately another seized Mohendra; for a man who consorts with Sannyasins, must necessarily be a Sannyasin. A third hero was about to arrest the dead body of Kalyani where it lay at length on the grass. Then he saw that it was the corpse of a woman and very possibly might not be a Sannyasin, and did not proceed with the arrest. On the same reasoning they left the little girl alone. Then without colloquy of any kind they bound the two prisoners and marched them off. The corpse of Kalyani and her little daughter remained lying unprotected at the foot of the tree.

Mohendra was at first almost senseless with the oppression of grief and the frenzy of divine love; he could not understand what was toward or what had happened and made no objection to being bound; but when they had gone a few paces, he awoke to the fact that they were being led away in bonds. Immediately it occurred to him that Kalyani's corpse was left lying without funeral rites, that his little daughter was left lying and that even now wild beasts might devour them, he wrenched his hands apart by sheer force and with the one wrench tore his bonds apart. With one kick he sent the jamadar sprawling to the ground and fell upon one of the sepoy; but the other three seized him from three sides and once more overpowered and rendered him helpless. Then Mohendra in the wretchedness of his grief said to the Brahmacharin Satyananda; "If only you had helped me a little, I would have slain these five miscreants." "What strength is there?" answered Satyananda, "in this aged body of mine. —except Him on whom I was calling, I have no other strength. Do not struggle against the inevitable. We shall not be able to overpower these five men. Come let us see where they will take us. The Lord will be our protection in all things." Then both of them without further attempt at escape followed the soldiers. When they had gone a little distance, Satyananda asked the sepoy, "My good fellows, I am in the habit of calling on the name of Hari; is there any objection to my calling on His

That was a dreadful prison, for it was seldom that he who entered came out, because there was no one to judge. ### MOONDAC UPANISHAD OF THE ATHARVAVEDA.

THE FIRST MOONDACA.

SECOND CHAPTER.

1. This is that which is the Truth of existence.

Works which the seers beheld in the Vedic wisdom, were extended in the Treta Age in many forms of righteousness. Works do ye perform religiously with one passion for the Truth; for this is the road to the heaven of your righteousness.

2. When the fire of sacrifice is kindled, when the flame sways and quivers, thou between the double pourings of butter cast therein with faith thy offerings.

3. For he whose altar-fires are empty of the dark-moon offering, and the full-moon offering, and the offering of the rains, and the offering of the firstfruits, or unfed, or fed without the ritual, or without guests, or without the dues to the Gods universal, him they exclude from the seven heavens.

4. Kali black, Korali-terrible, Manojava thought-swift, Sulohita bloodred, Sudhumravarna smoke-hued, Sphulingini scattering sparks, Viswaruchi all-beautiful, these are the seven swaying tongues of the fire.

5. He who when these are flaming bright, performs seasonably the ritual and they accept his offerings, him the rays of the sun bear upward where the one Lord over all the gods inhabiteth.

6. "Come with us, come with us," they cry to him, those bright fires of sacrifice, they bear him up on the sunbeams, saying to him sweet words of pleasantness, doing him much homage, "this is the holy world of Brahma and the heaven of your righteousness."

7. But the ships of sacrifice are frail and the works of sacrifice are feeble, all the eighteen of sacrifice: these are the works that are called the lesser; fools are they who hail them as the supreme good, they shall return again to the jurisdiction of age and death.

8. They who dwell in ignorance, they who deem themselves learned, who say, "We, even we are the wise and the sages,"—fools are they, they wander about beaten and stumbling like blind men led by the blind.

9. They who dwell in the many bonds of the Ignorance, children, thinking "We have conquered our Paradise"; for when men in their acts are slaves of their affections and know not God, then are they doomed to anguish, then their Paradise wastes by enjoying, then they fall back to earth from heaven.

10. Minds bewildered who hold the oblation offered and the well dug for greatest righteousness and know not any other good; they on the back of heaven enjoy their righteousness, then they reenter this or even a lower world.

11. But they who in the forest follow after faith and self-discipline, calm, full of knowledge, living upon alms, cast from them the obstructions of passion; through the gates of the sun they pass to that country where is the Purusha who is beyond mortality, spirit that never waneth.

12. The Brahmin, having tested the heavens heaped up by work, becometh weary of their joys, for not through work done He abideth who is detached from all action; fuel in hand let him approach for the knowledge one that is learned in the Vedas and hath devotion to the Brahman.

13. To him will be that knoweth utter unreservedly, proceeding from the science of things, the God knowledge by which one cometh to know the Immutable Purusha who is the Truth of existence,—because he comes to him with a mind tranquillised, with a pure and quiet soul.

1. This is that which is the Truth of existence.

As from one burning fire a million different sparks are born and all have the form of fire, so from the Immutable Being manifold existences proceed; they return also into the Immutable.

THE FUNCTION OF SCHOOLS OF ART IN INDIA

In the Journal of the Society of Arts for June, 1902, there is a printed lecture delivered before the Society in London on May, 27th, by Mr. Cecil Burns, Principal of the Sir Jamssetjee Jeejeebhoy School of Art in Bombay.

The whole matter is of great importance in relation to the economic future of India, and the moral and intellectual significance and value of Indian Nationalism, for India and for the world.

I know nothing whatever directly of Mr. Burns himself. It seems to me that he speaks as one who is sincere, enthusiastic, and well-intentioned; but I think that he, and his pupils, are equally victims of a system and a point of view which are likely to continue in the future as in the past, to destroy the possibility of sincerity, imagination and individuality in art, whether in Europe or in India.

I have twice visited the Bombay School of Art, and on each occasion was impressed with the entire lack of inspiration, the dreary futility of nearly all that was going on. The whole regime, from ideals to methods, like the education provided in Missionary schools and contemplated in official Universities, was so entirely un-Indian, as to explain at once the dullness of the results. It is the irony of fate that the one School of Art built and endowed by an Indian, should be the least Indian in aims and methods.

Mr. Burns' own acquaintance with Indian art seems to be entirely academic. I do not remember that there was a single good Indian painting on the walls of the school. However, I may illustrate the point by a reference to jewellery. No one possessing any serious knowledge of Indian Jewellery could speak "of the massive proportions and primitive character of Indian jewellery." Mr. Burns is probably acquainted only with such jewellery as he has seen in museums, where anthropologists collect together whatever is primitive and barbarous, to the exclusion of what is refined and delicate. It is nonsense to talk of the "lighter and more delicate styles of workmanship of Europe." There are hundreds of goldsmiths in India who can execute fine work in gold, such as few, perhaps no European craftsman could imitate. Sir George Birdwood, indeed, long ago contrasted the delicate workmanship of Indian jewellery, where the cost of workmanship is in very high proportion to that of the value of the materials, with the much heavier and clumsy work of English jewellery, valued mainly for its intrinsic worth. Amongst the Indian peoples, there are races in many different stages of culture, and it is observable that Anglo-Indians usually study and generalise from those of the lower types. Mr. Burns appears to have gathered his ideas of Indian jewellery from the hill tribes. The goldsmith of Southern India, or the enameller of Jaipur, has much more to teach than to learn in a School of Art—and I have heard art teachers in England express their desire to get such teachers if they could.

Mr. Burns, again, complains of the mixture of baser metals with Indian silver, and contrasts this state of affairs with the "hall-marking" at "Goldsmith's Hall" in London, which guarantees the quality of English Plate. Now, although Mr. Burns admits that "the European visitor has been the means of encouraging the faults most noticeable in the Indian silversmiths," he does not quite realise the significance of the degradation of standard he refers to. Perhaps the following story will explain that significance better:—"Formerly," says Sir George Birdwood, "a great industry in gold-embroidered shoes flourished at Lucknow. They were in demand all over India, for the native Kings of Oudh would not allow the shoemakers to use any but pure gold wire on them. But when we annexed the kingdom, all such restrictions were removed, and the bazaars of Oudh were at once flooded with the pinchbeck embroidered shoes of Delhi, and the Lucknow shoemakers were swept away for ever by the besom of free trade." Again Sir W. Lawrence writes of Srinagar trades, "The state exercised a vigorous supervision over the quality of the raw material and the manufactured article. In the good days of the shawl trade no spurious wool was brought in from Amritsar to be mixed with the real shawl-wool of Central Asia and woe betide the weaver who did bad work or the silver-smith who was too liberal with his alloy. There is such supervision nowadays." Again, it is only in the Native state of Kashmir at the present day that the importation of aniline dyes is prohibited; everywhere else they have been allowed to do their destructive work unchecked.

Now what is this 'hall-marking' of which Mr. Burns speaks? It is nothing more than the last forlorn relic of the once universally exercised power of the English guilds to protect the standard of production; and this relic is upheld by law. There is no reason why the present rulers of India should not have continued to the trade guilds the support which they received under Indian Kings; there is no reason why some guarantee of standard should not, through the still existing guilds, be enforced for Indian silverwork. There is a reason perhaps—that Englishmen do not so deeply care for the future of Indian art and industry as to think much about the matter, but it is cruel at the same time to tempt the Indian craftsman with the degradation of his standard, as if that degradation had been of his deliberate choosing. No other causes than the withdrawal of state protection and the change in educated Indian taste (which does deserve contempt) are at the root of the evil in this case.

This change of taste is essentially snobishness—for Indians are not content to be politically and economically dependent, but must fawn upon their rulers to the extent of anglicising their houses and their lives. It appears to be the ambition of some to be English in all but colour. I am not surprised at Mr. Burn's statement, that out of over two hundred presents at a fashionable Indian wedding, only sixteen were of Indian origin. I should say that this eight per cent fairly represents the "Indianness" in the mind of a thoroughly anglicised and "educated" Indian of to-day. One other instance of Mr. Burn's apparent ignorance of Indian Art. He says that in India "painting and sculpture had never been considered except as parts of the decorative scheme of a building or some other composite work." It would take too long to show here, that this statement, which would be equally true of Mediaeval Europe, is merely another way of saying that all the arts were harmonised in one great unity, based as all art must be on architecture. The modern method of painting pictures and sticking them indiscriminately on nails about the walls of houses comes as near perhaps to the absolute divorce of art from architecture as is possible; but it is not a sign of taste on which to congratulate the moderns. The old Indians knew better, that walls were to be painted on, and that the heart and centre of the temple was its image; and neither painting nor image were executed apart from any consideration of the place they were to occupy. But I have spoken of Mr. Burn's apparent ignorance, and in so doing I referred to the fact that he here ignores the portfolio pictures of the Mogul period in Northern India; and as he has placed none of these exquisite things on the wall of his school of art, I am forced to suppose that he is not aware of their existence. The old Mogul nobles had the good taste not to do the wall of their house with miscellaneous pictures hanging at all angles (as they may be seen in the houses of "educated" Indians to day), but to employ the most skilled miniature painters to paint for them pictures for the subject traditional in North Indian Culture, the portraits of Kings and saints, the love of Laila and Majnun, picture of the chase or of war; and there are not wanting also Hindu subjects, Uma serving Mahadeva and many a picture of the Lord of the Eternal Snows Himself. All these things, which more sympathetic and more understanding men like Mr. Havell and Mr. Percy Brown have collected in their schools of Calcutta and Lahore and made the basis of their teaching Mr. Burns ignores. It is only such portfolio pictures which like a book, form in themselves a unity that are rightly to be considered apart from architecture; but Mr. Burns informs us that painting in India was never so considered.

Two causes of decline of Indian crafts Mr. Burns has omitted to mention: one is the passing away of many native courts, as in Tanjore where the court was the great patron of these sumptuary arts; the other the fact that India is not a sovereign State with ambassadors and consuls scattered through the world to send home information of the true requirements of those countries with which India might still conduct as once she did, an export trade in the products of sumptuary arts.

Mr. Burns is probably right in thinking that Indian students must for a time be brought back into closer touch with nature. But are Englishmen the right men for this work? And must it not rather be by harmonising life with nature, than by merely imitating nature in a School of Art? The Indian must see with his own eyes. Two things are needful, one that he should be saturated with the traditional art of his race in order that he may know how to see, the other that he be saturated with the traditional culture of the East, that he may know what to see; for it would be meaningless to base the decorative art of a people upon rare plant forms, (however beautiful) which have not appealed already to the race-imagination and have no part in the race-life or in the literature. All this merely goes to show that the work of truly restoring the arts and crafts of India can only be done by Indians. Englishmen can at best but help as some have done but some have hindered too.

Mr. Burns is afraid that government,

"as is usual in India," will have to show the way. Why not? As Mr. Burns points out, there are thirty schools of art in an area of about hundred square miles in London, having some four hundred professors and instructors. The schools are supported by public grants. I do not know why it should be otherwise in India. I only wonder whether Englishmen as a whole really wish to revive the arts and industries of India in such an effective manner as shall enable them to compete successfully with those of England.

The ancient craft work of India is not "as dead as the art of the Greeks or of the Renaissance Europe." Only one whose experience was confined to an Anglicised, commercial and unromantic town like Bombay, could think that. The crafts of India are indeed, in a bad way but they could be saved by a true national impulse by a true swadeshi spirit. But a swadeshi that seeks only to boycott or imitate European manufacture, for a temporary political end will not save them: nor will four schools of art in India, administered by men who are prepared to acquiesce with remonstrance on the official decision to adopt European styles (i.e. second-hand Gothic or third hand classic) in government and other public buildings save them any the more. Is it not, by the way, perhaps an omen that the Victoria Memorial building in Calcutta, designed after much controversy, in the European manner, is slowly sinking in the Ganges mud?

Mr. Burns has a contempt for the way in which modern craftsmen "are content to let their ancestors do their thinking for them." This is one way of looking at tradition; and perhaps there is some wisdom in giving a due place to the demand for a 'return to nature'. But while it is true that art never stands still, and it is not sufficient to teach and to copy old designs, nevertheless India is not yet, and surely never will be so changed, that the whole spirit of her decorative art must be changed too. It is much more the case that a return to nature, must be a return to sincerity and a return to nature in life-itself. The arts of India must retain their Indian spirit or become altogether worthless. The springs of art are in life itself, and when the life of the people is revitalised and re-inspired, this new life will be reflected in Indian decorative art. The applied arts cannot be isolated and located as a thing apart from the national life, and the future of Indian art depends on the future of nationalism amongst us. You cannot gather grapes of thorns; and a denationalised people, an India subdued by Europe, not merely outwardly, but in her inmost self, will not produce a national art. That India is not really so subdued, that the national movement that stirred her deepest life has a deeper significance than one that is merely political and economic has already been proved by the development of the National School of Painting in Bengal. But if Abanindranath Tagore and his followers stand in this art-revival of ours, in the place occupied by Burne-Jones in the history of English art, where is our William Morris? Probably the time of his coming is not ripe. When he comes, he will do more for Indian applied art than all the schools together; but it is the function of the schools to make the path no harder than it need be.

The real difficulty at the root of all questions in Indian education is this, that modern education in India, the education which Englishmen are proud of having 'given' to India is really based in the general assumption (quite universal in England) that India is a savage country, which it is England's divine mission to civilise. This is the more or less unconscious underlying principle throughout. The facts were more truly realised by Sir Thomas Munro, when he wrote that, 'if civilisation were to be made an article of commerce between the two countries, England would soon be heavily in debt.' Next to Persia or perhaps together with Persia India is the world's great treasury of design. Having decided upon the establishment of Schools of Art, it might then have been expected that educationists would have enquired upon that lines of artistic education was given by these artistic master draftsmen to their pupils and apprentices. This, however, would have been running counter to the principle above enunciated: and so, in times gone by, the old fashioned South Kensington routine was introduced into India; for more advanced students, drawing from casts of Greek statuary and Gothic architecture water colour and sketching and all the rest of it. Result, that quite a large number of men attained a second or third rate English standard. Probably no Indian artist so trained has done work good enough to be accepted by the royal academy, much less good enough to be refused by that august body!

The true function of Schools of Art in India, is not to introduce European methods and ideals but gather up and revitalise the broken thread of Indian tradition to build up the idea of Indian Art as an integral part of the national culture, and to relate the work of Indian craftsmen to the life and thought of the Indian people. So far from this, the School of Art craftsmen has hitherto worked essentially for a foreign public, making things which neither he nor his own people desire to use but only to sell. No wonder the hinges do not work and the legs are wobbly. When Indian craftsmen worked for the Indian people, they knew what was wanted, and why, and their work was altogether serviceable. Now that they work for tourist or occupy themselves in carving furniture for a Anglo-Indian bungalow, or in making teapots overloaded with cheap ornament for Anglo-Indian tea-tables, it is naturally otherwise.

I have said that true work of School of Art in India today, is to gather up and revitalise the broken threads of Indian tradition. But who can do this work? Not many Englishmen possess the necessary patience, or the necessary will. Like all true education in India, this work must be done by Indians. It is a question of national education. This question, touching as it does the vital base of the whole of Indian life, is of more importance than any political or economic matter. Rather than the achievement of any measure of progress in those directions, I would see Indians united in a demand for the complete and entire control of Indian education in all its branches, and determined that that education shall produce Indian men and women—not mere clerks, or makers of pretty curiosities of passing tourists.

To this end one thing is needful—that the present generation of educated Indians should cease to be snobs. As I wrote lately in another place. "If we loved and understood Indian art we should know that even now the Indian craftsmen could if we would let him build for us and clothe us in ways of beauty that could not be attained to in modern Europe for any expenditure of money at all. We would if we might, even to-day, live like the very gods; but we lost after the fleshpots of Egypt, and deservedly our economy suffers."

Mr. Burns perceive the true difficulty when he says that only a compelling movement from within the country could have accomplished the revival of Indian art on traditional lines that compelling movement lacked; and the result followed, that "India" from an artistic point of view became and since remained a suburb of Paris and London as she is the industrial suburb of Manchester and Birmingham.

The one great question to-day is this: "Is the compelling movement with the country which we call Nationalism strong enough for the Herculean task before it, the conversion of a generation of parasytes into a nation of Orientals?" Every word of the answer to this question will be faithfully recorded in the progress or decline of Indian art.

It rests with the Indian people themselves to say what the answer shall be.

BABAR IN LEGEND.

THE CAESAR OF THE EAST.

Babar has been called the Caesar of the East. In consideration of the number of legends that have gathered round him, he might also be styled the Charlamagne of the East. One story about him is that he disguised himself and a number of his courtiers as Calandar, or wandering Mohamedan devotees, and went to India to spy out the land. He was discovered and arrested, but Sikandar Lodi, the reigning king of Agra, allowed him to depart on condition that he would not invade India during Sikandar's lifetime. Babar kept his promise but took the country from Sikandar's son Ibrahim, whom he defeated and slew at Panipat. The story of the visit in disguise cannot be true, but the tradition is an old one and is told by De Laet, a Dutch historiographer of the seventeenth century who got his information from Van den Breesche, the governor of Surat. According to this version the occurrence was depicted on the walls of the palace at Lahore. It is also, I think mentioned by Finch. Manucci, too, tells the story, but his account is that Babar disguised himself as a Hindu "jogee" and that he was accompanied by his mysterious Prime Minister, Rangulidas.

It was natural that legends should spring up about Babar for he was, as Elphinstone says, "the most admirable prince that ever reigned in Asia," and his career was a most romantic one and full of hair-breadth escapes. His misfortunes began early. His father, who was king of Ferghana now Russian province was killed by the collapse of his pigeon-house when only thirty-nine years of age, and Babar, who was his eldest son, was left as boy of twelve to defend his kingdom against his uncles. These two, one being his paternal and the other his maternal uncle invaded Ferghana from the north and south and came within a few miles of Babar's residence at Andijan. But they found the task harder than they expected. The people of the country gathered round their youthful sovereign, sickness broke out among the invading troops, and uncle retired and died on the way home, and the other went back to the wilds of Meghuistan.

UPS AND DOWNS.

After this Babar had many ups and downs. Three times did he get possession of Samarkand, the second occasion being a brilliant feat of arms and performed when he was only nineteen years of age but he was never able to maintain himself in the city for more than a few months. With all his prowess he was not a match for his Uzbek opponent Shabani Khan who was an older and more experienced warrior. Babar represented Tamerlane of whom he was sixth descendant, though he was also connected through his mother with Benghis Khan, her father being descended from Benghis's second son but Shabani perhaps of an even more illustrious descent, for he was the lineal representative of Juji Khan, who was Benghis's eldest son.

The legend about Babar which I have now to relate refers to a period included in the longest gap in his Memoirs, one, namely, which extends over eleven years, from 1508 to 1519. It is said that when he was flying from Samarkand, after his third unsuccessful attempt to hold it he came in 1512, to the Khojent river, the ancient Jaxartes which flows through Ferghana, and eventually enters the Sea of Aral. One of his wives, said in one of the accounts to be named Afaq Begam had given birth to a child and it was found impossible to convey the infant further. Perhaps the mother had died. So the child was wrapped up, and laid in a splendid cradle and placed on the river bank, while Babar and his companions pursued their wild ride to the eastward. A servant, however, was left, and told to hide in the neighbourhood, and to report if the cradle was taken up by the country people. There were Uzbek villagers about then, as they had to come to look after the irrigation of their crops. The servant waited till he saw that the villagers took up the cradle, and then rushed forward to join his master. The finders of the cradle belonged to three villages, and so they divided the treasure trove into three portions. One villager took the cradle, another took the gold ornaments and the third took the baby. The last received the name of Altm Beshunk, or the Golden Cradle, in allusion to the gold ornaments found with him. He was made over to a nurse, and carefully reared. It is said that afterwards when Babar became prosperous, he sent to make inquiries about his child, and wished to have it sent to him. But when the people found that the boy was a genuine descendant of Tamerlane, they refused to give him up. They made him their ruler, and furnished him with a wife, and he became the progenitor of the family which governed Ferghana of centuries.

FORGETFULNESS FOR SELF.

The last legend about Babar, and one which is probably true, is that he took upon himself the illness of his beloved son, Humayun. The latter was brought down from his government in Sambhal to Agra dangerously ill with malarial fever. His father and mother watched over him, but the physicians were powerless, and there seemed no hope of his recovery. At last a learned divine suggested that the only chance for Humayun was to have him taken to the city of his birth.

yun's life was for his father to sacrifice for him the dearest of his possessions, and that this might be done by selling the great royal diamond—supposed to be the Koh-i-Nur—and giving the proceeds to the poor. "What is the worth of a stone?" cried Babar, "Humayun is the dearest of my possessions, as I am the dearest of his; I will give my life for him. So he mentally took Humayun's illness on himself, paced three times round his bed, and cried out 'We have borne it away, we have borne it away!' Tradition says that immediately thereafter, Humayun rose refreshed, and bathed, etc., while Babar sank down in illness, and never left his bed again. His dying prayer to his son was that he would always forgive his younger brothers whatever wrong they might commit against him. Weak man though he was, Humayun struggled long and earnestly to respect the wish of a father who had died to succour him, and it was only under pressure from his nobles, and after repeated rebellions that he consented to punish his brother Karamul. — By H. that the Act as now passed avoids unnecessary and irritating interference, and at the same time affords ample machinery for dealing with the evil it is intended to meet. The causes which have rendered legislation necessary were so fully and ably explained to you by Sir Herbert Stanley on Friday last and were so eloquently laid before you by the Hon'ble Mr. Sinha to-day that I need not attempt to repeat them to you. I would rather draw your attention to the political importance and significance of to-day's discussion. The members of this greatly enlarged Council thoroughly representative of Indian interests, have passed what may be justly called a repressive measure, because they believe with the Government of India that that measure is essential to the welfare of this country, in so doing they have furnished the proof which I have always hoped and believed that they would furnish—that increased representation of Indian interests and communities would not weaken, but would vastly strengthen British administration. That being so, I hope I am right in assuming that we are at the commencement of that new political era of which I have so often spoken, and that the presence on this Council of the leading public men of India may be afforded the Viceroy's Government the loyal advice of which it has so often stood in need.

In accordance with this view the Government of India has decided to obliterate, as far as they have it in their power to obliterate, the sore feeling caused by the action which has been forced upon them by past emergencies. We have determined to release the State prisoners who were deported under Regulation III of 1818. Our justification for their release is based upon the belief that the political position has entirely changed, that the political movement of which they were the leaders—seditions as it was—has degenerated into an anarchical plot which can no longer be legitimately included as part of the political agitation in which they were so culpably implicated. We believe that we are no longer confronted by a political movement, such as they inaugurated, but are face to face with an anarchical conspiracy waging war against British and Indian communities alike, and that it will be long before we can exterminate the evil unless those communities agree to work together hand in hand. We believe that their mutual efforts will be greatly encouraged by the release of the deportees as showing that Government is willing to trust the influential classes of the people and to rely upon their co-operation and loyalty.

But though we have come to this decision, we cannot for an instant disregard the probability of further attempts at outrages, and that probability we are determined to combat with all the weapons at our disposal.

In the meantime we trust that the Act which this Council has passed to-day will efficiently control the source from which so much evil has emanated.

MAX ON THE WAY OF TRANSGRESSORS —

"Bhendra Nath Dutta Gupta, the anarchist, who murdered Inspector Alum, was arraigned before the Criminal Sessions Court yesterday, the result was—the sentence of death, exactly eight days after the foul deed had been committed. In connection with the treatment which this young scoundrel is getting inside the prison, it is sickening to read that the authorities are coddling the culprit with sweetmeats and other delicacies at his own request. There is no necessity for cruelty in the case of any prisoner, but the treatment of a murderer awaiting the scaffold ought to be of a deferent nature to would-be murderers outside. The bare necessities of life, bread and water, are good enough for any condemned scoundrel, and being of no religion whatever, his dead body, without any ceremony, ought to be buried in a pit after being covered with quicklime, as speedily as possible. Anyone who object to this treatment can easily escape it by becoming good, peaceful, law-abiding citizens. As for others it ought to get burnt in upon their consciences (those who still have such) that 'The way of transgressors is HARD.'"

ALIENS IN ANCIENT INDIA.

The treatment accorded to British Indian subjects in South Africa at the present moment raises the interesting and in some respects important question of the treatment that aliens received over two thousand years ago, in India. Trade attracted foreigners to India from the earliest times. During the Mauryan times, foreigners—mainly Greeks—were found apparently in large numbers at Patna, the capital city of the Empire. At the time Chandragupta was king, a special Board of the Municipality of Patna—the system of Municipal Government is not new in India, but at least as old as the fourth century A.D.—was entrusted with the duty of helping them in every way. The Municipal Corporation of that town consisted of six Committees and the second of these was entrusted with the important duty of taking care and helping foreign residents in it. "The second," we read in Strabo's Fragment of the Indika of Megasthenes, "entertain strangers, assign them lodgings and observe their modes of life by means of attendants whom they attach to them and escort them out of the country or send home their property, take care of them in sickness, and when they die, bury them." There were no restrictions against their landing or even settling for purposes of trade or otherwise (we infer they had their own trade associations, and even partnerships for trade purposes in India at the time) in the king's dominions; on the other hand, they were assisted by special men appointed by the Board; they were given suitable lodgings and escorts, and in times of need Medical assistance. If they died, they were accorded decent burials, and the Board administered their estates until they sent their assets to those entitled to them in their mother countries. The foreign traders of his time were shown special concessions in their several trades. The Superintendent of Commerce of the State was specially directed—so we read in Chanakya's Science of Politics now in course of translation by Mr. Shama Sa-tri, a Sanskrit scholar of Mysore—to show favor to those who import foreign merchandise. Mariners and other importers of foreign articles, who were apparently resident foreigners, were favoured with remission of trade-taxes. They were for instance, exempted from being sued for debts unless they were local associations and partners.

The same treatment may be presumed to have been accorded to other foreigners resident in India. Such, for instance, the Roman Colony resident at Madura both before and after the Second Century after Christ, and that at Cranganore about the same time.

The fair and even liberal treatment that has long been accorded to the Syrian Christians and the Jews now found on the West Coast, may also be taken to indicate the real position of purely Hindu Sovereigns towards the foreigners that came to settle permanently amidst them. True it is, they are not Europeans, like the old Roman and Greek Colonists of Patna, Madura and Cranganore. But the question to old Hindu Sovereigns was certainly not whether they were of Eastern or Western origin, but whether they were different in nationality or not—in short, whether they were not foreign to India. Syrian or Jew, Greek or Roman, all meant the same to them—different in nationality, religion, language, dress, diet, &c. The copper plates of the White Jews of Cochin and the Tirunelli plates, both granted by King Bhaskara Ravi Varman and which have been assigned by scholars to dates varying from the 2nd to the 8th century A. D., chronicle a whole history on them. They record the rights and privileges bestowed on the Anjuvannam, apparently a Trading Corporation. These rights and privileges are still to some extent enjoyed by the Jews. They show that they were accorded, privileges that ordinarily go to royal chiefs and other dignitaries in this part of India; for example, the use of light by day, the spreading of cloth, the use of palanquin, the umbrella, the drum and the trumpet. They were, besides, exempted from the payment of dues to the Royal palate.

Then, again, there were, in ancient or mediæval India no restrictions against the landing of foreigners. The so-called education test (the knowledge necessary to write and read English) that some of the British Colonies insist now on Indiana, did not find its counterpart in Ancient India. The very idea of such a test would have looked monstrous to the old Hindu and Mahomedan Sovereigns of India. A law of Krishna Raya, the greatest of the Vijayanagar Emperors (1509—1530, A. D.) which required every foreigner who entered his dominions to write and read Telugu, the State language of the day, would have effectually shut out every Portuguese trader from the Vijayanagar dominions which included the whole of Southern India at the time. But the very idea of such a prohibitory test was not thought of, and that shows the amity and good feeling with which Indians treated all foreigners, whether traders or not, who came to their dominion. Indeed, there is hardly any evidence to show that the Mahomedan and Moghul Sovereigns departed from the Hindu rule of perfect friendliness and liberality towards foreigners. At their hands, all classes of foreigners received a fair and liberal treatment, that is in glaring contrast with that now meted out to British Indians in British Colonies.

The difficulty felt by
many students and educated men of small means in
buying the KARMAYOGIN
at its ordinary price of two annas, has been so much pressed on our attention
that we have found it necessary to bring out a cheaper edition at one anna a copy.
It is not an easy thing in this country to establish a weekly review of this standard written in English,
and it has therefore been necessary for us at the outset to place a price on the paper which should ensure its being self-supporting even with a limited circulation. The KARMA-
YOGIN, however, is now
sufficiently successful to allow of a concession of this kind being made without financial injury. The subscribers to the superior edition will be compensated
by the superior get-up and
paper, while the cheaper edition will remove the grievance of the large number who have hitherto been debarred from reading the review by their scanty
means.

PASSING THOUGHTS.

The Bhagalpur Literary Conference.

The prevalence of annual conferences in the semi-Europeanised life of Bengal is a curious phenomenon eloquent of the unreality of our present culture and the inefficiency of our modernised existence. Our old life was well, even minutely organised on an intelligent and consistent Oriental model. The modern life of Europe is well and largely organised on an intelligent and consistent Occidental model. It materialises certain main ideas of life and wellbeing, provides certain centres of life, equips them efficiently, serves the objects with which they are instituted. Our old life did the same. But this is precisely what our modern life does not do. Its institutions are apes of a foreign plan, unintelligent expressions of an idea which is not ours; they serve no civic, no national purpose. They are the spasmodic movements of an organism whose own life is arrested, but which feels itself compelled to move, however awkwardly and uselessly, if only to persuade itself that it is not dead. We have for instance a Literary Conference which meets once a year, if nothing occurs to prevent it. But such an annual celebration has no intelligent purpose except as the centre of an organised literary life. The pulse of our literary life is feeble and artificial. Its centres are conspicuous by their absence. In Europe the club, the literary paper, the coterie, the school of writing, the Academy are distinct entities in which the members of the organism have living relations, a common atmosphere, a common intellectual food. They have no Literary Conference because the literary life of Europe is a reality. We in India have neither these institutions nor any other centres of our own. The Conference is a convulsive attempt to relate ourselves to each other, which evinces a vague desire for united living, but no capacity to effect it. There was a time when a vigorous literary life seemed about to form itself in Bengal, and its relics are seen in the literary magazine and the Sahitya Parishat; but at present these serve only to record the extremely languid pulsation of our intellectual existence. The great intellectual stir, hopefulness and activity of the last century has disappeared. The individual lives to himself, vigorously or feebly, according to the varying robustness of his personality or intensity of his temperament. Coordination is still far from us.

Life And Institutions.

Life creates institutions; institutions do not create, but express and preserve life. This is a truth we are too apt to forget. The Europeans and especially our gurus, the English, attach an exaggerated importance to machinery, because their own machinery has been so successful, their organisation so strong and triumphant. In the conceit of this success they imagine that their machinery is the only machinery and that the adoption of their organisation by foreign peoples is all that is needed for perfect social and political felicity. In Europe this blind attachment to machinery does not do fatal harm, because the life of a free nation has developed the existing institutions and modifies them by its own irresistible law of life and development. But to take over those institutions and think that they will magically develop European virtues, force and robustness, or the vivid and vigorous life of Europe, is as if a man were to steal another's coat and think to take over with it his character. Have not indeed many of us thought by masquerading in the amazing garb which nineteenth century Europe developed, to become so many brown Englishmen? This curious conjuring trick did not work; hatted, coated and pantalooned, we still kept the chaddar and the dhooty in our characters. The fond attempt to become great, enlightened and civilised by borrowing European institutions will be an equally disastrous failure.

Indian Conservatism

In India we were, if possible, even more attached to our machinery—all the more because we had ceased to understand the science of social mechanics which they embodied. We attached a superstitious importance to maintaining our society exactly in the mould of our Shastras while in reality that mould had been altered out of recognition centuries ago. We quoted Parasara and Manu while we followed Raghunandan and custom. This religious fiction was very much like the English superstition about the British constitution which is supposed to be the same thing it was in the days of Lord Somers, but is really a thing Lord Somers would have stared at aghast as an unrecognisable democratic horror. The cause is the same in both cases—a robust and tenacious society freely developing its machinery in response to its inner needs while cherishing and preserving them. Englishman and Hindu have been alike in their tenacious conservatism and their refusal to accept revolution, alike in their respect for law and the thing established, alike in their readiness to change rapidly and steadily if the innovator would only disguise from them the fact that they were changing. The Hindu advanced more slowly because he was an Asiatic in a period of contraction, the Englishman more quickly because he was an European in a period of expansion. If our social reformers had understood this Indian characteristic, they might have revolutionized our society with comparatively small friction, but the parade of revolution which they made hampered their cause. Even as it is, Indian Society, in Bengal at least, is changing utterly while all the time loudly protesting that it has not changed and will not change. The mould in which Raghunandan cast society, is disintegrating as utterly as the mould of Parasara or Manu has disintegrated. What will replace it, is another matter.

Samaj and Shashtra.

Every Samaj must have its Shashtra, written or unwritten. Where there is no Social Scripture, there is none the less a minute and rigid code of social laws binding men in their minutest actions. The etiquette of the European is no less binding than the minute scrupulosities of Manu or Raghunandan, and it is even more minute and scrupulous. It is a mistake to think that in Europe men can eat as they will, talk as they will, act as they will with impunity. They cannot—or at least they could not, though one hears of strange revolutions, and in the days of the suffragette everything is possible. Society everywhere is exacting, scrupulous, minute, pitiless in punishment of slight departures from its code, however absurd and unreasonable that code may be. But while in India, the sanction is religious, in Europe it is social. In India a man dreaded spiritual impurity, in Europe he shrinks from the sneers and dislike of his class or his fellows. Social excommunication is always the ultimate penalty.

Revolution.

But in Europe and India alike we seem to stand on the threshold of a vast revolution, political, social and religious. Whatever nation now is the first to solve the problems which are threatening to hammer Governments, creeds, societies into pieces all the world over, will lead the world in the age that is coming. It is our ambition that India should be that nation. But in order that she should be what we wish, it is necessary that she should be capable of unsparing revolution. She must have the courage of her past knowledge and the immensity of soul that will measure itself with her future. This is impossible to England, it is not impossible to India. She has in her something daemonic, volcanic, elemental—she can rise above conventions, she can break through formalities and prejudices. But she will not do so unless she is sure that she has God's command to do it,—unless the Avatar descends and leads. She will follow a Buddha or a Mohammad wherever he will lead her, because he is to her either God himself, or his servant,—because as Sri Ramakrishna would have put it, she saw the chupras. It was a little of that daemonic, volcanic, elemental thing in the heart of the Indian which Lord Curzon lashed into life in 1905. But the awakening was too narrow in its scope, too feebly supported with strength, too ill-informed in knowledge. Above all the Avatar had not descended. So the movement has drawn back to await a farther and truer impulse. Meanwhile let it inform its intellect and put more iron into its heart, awaiting a diviner manifestation.

THE STRENGTH OF STILLNESS.

There are two great forces in the universe, silence and speech. Silence prepares, speech creates. Silence acts, speech gives the impulse to action. Silence compels, speech persuades. The immense and inscrutable processes of the world all perfect themselves within, in a deep and august silence, covered by a noisy and misleading surface of sound—the stir of innumerable waves above, the fathomless restless mass of the ocean's waters below. Men see the waves, they hear the rumour and the thousand voices and by these they judge the course of the future and the heart of God's intention; but in nine cases out of ten they misjudge. Therefore it is said that in History it is always the unexpected that happens. But it would not be the unexpected if men could turn their eyes from superficies and look into substance, if they accustomed themselves to put aside appearances and penetrate beyond them to the secret and disguised reality, if they ceased listening to the noise of life and listened rather to its silence.

The greatest exertions are made with the breath held in; the faster the breathing, the more the dissipation of energy. He who in action, can cease from breathing,—naturally, spontaneously,—is the master of Prana, the energy that acts and creates throughout the universe. It is a common experience of the Yogin that when thought ceases, breathing ceases,—the entire kumbhak effected by the Hathayogin with infinite trouble and gigantic effort, establishes itself easily and happily,—but when thought begins again, the breath resumes its activity. But when the thought flows without the resumption of the inbreathing and outbreathing, then the Prana is truly conquered. This is a law of Nature. When we strive to act, the forces of Nature do their will with us; when we grow still, we become their master. But there are two kinds of stillness—the helpless stillness of inertia, which heralds dissolution, and the stillness of assured sovereignty which commands the harmony of life. It is the sovereign stillness which is the calm of the Yogin. The more complete the calm, the mightier the yogic power, the greater the force in action.

In this calm right knowledge comes. The thoughts of men are a tangle of truth and falsehood, satyam and anritam. True perception is marred and clouded by false perception, true judgment lamed by false judgment, true imagination distorted by false imagination, true memory deceived by false memory. The activity of the mind must cease, the chitta be purified, a silence fall upon the restlessness of Prakriti, then in that calm, in that voiceless stillness illumination comes upon the mind, error begins to fall away and, so long as desire does not stir again, clarity establishes itself in the higher stratum of the consciousness compelling peace and joy in the lower. Right knowledge becomes the infallible source of right action. Yogah karmasu kau-shalam.

The knowledge of the Yogin is not the knowledge of the average desire-driven mind. Neither is it the knowledge of the scientific or of the worldly-wise reason which anchors itself on surface facts and leans upon experience and probability. The Yogin knows God's way of working and is aware that the improbable often happens, that facts mislead. He rises above reason to that direct and illuminated knowledge which we call vijnanam. The desire-driven mind is emmeshed in the intricate tangle of good and evil, of the pleasant and the unpleasant, of happiness and misfortune. It strives to have the good always, the pleasant always, the happiness always. It is elated by fortunate happenings, disturbed and unnerved by their opposite. But the illuminated eye of the seer perceives that all leads to good; for God is all and God is sarvamangalam. He knows that the apparent evil is often the shortest way to the good, the unpleasant indispensable to prepare the pleasant, misfortune the condition of obtaining a more perfect happiness. His intellect is delivered from enslavement to the dualities.

Therefore the action of the Yogin will not be as the action of the ordinary man. He will often seem to acquiesce in evil, to avoid the chance of relieving misfortune, to refuse his assent to the efforts of the noble-hearted who withstand violence and wickedness; he will seem to be acting pisachavat. Or men will think him jada, inert, a stone, a block, because he is passive, where activity appears to be called for; silent, where men expect voicefulness; unmoved, where there is reason for deep and passionate feeling. When he acts, men will call him unmatta, a madman, eccentric or idiot; for his actions will often seem to have no definite result or purpose, to be wild, unregulated, regardless of sense and probability or inspired by a purpose and a vision which is not for this world. And it is true that he follows a light which other men do not possess or would even call darkness; that what is a dream to them, is to him a reality; that their night is his day. And this is the root of the difference that, while they reason, he knows.

To be capable of silence, stillness, illuminated passivity is to be fit for immortality—amritatvaya kalpate. It is to be dharma, the ideal of our ancient civilisation, which does not mean to be tamasic, inert and a block. The inaction of the tamasic man is a stumblingblock to the energies around him, the inaction of the Yogin creates, preserves and destroys; his action is dynamic with the direct, stupendous driving-power of great natural forces. It is a stillness within often covered by a ripple of talk and activity without,—the ocean with its lively surface of waves. But even as men do not see the reality of God's workings from the superficial noise of the world and its passing events, for they are hidden beneath that cover, so also shall they fail to understand the action of the Yogin, for he is different within from what he is outside. The strength of noise and activity is, doubtless, great,—did not the walls of Jericho fall by the force of noise? But infinite is the strength of the stillness and the silence, in which great forces prepare for action.

A NOTE ON CIVIC FORMS EAST AND WEST.

There is nothing so essential to the success of a great undertaking as a disinterested motive, binding together the members of the central group. This is why the family tends to supplant the nucleus of shareholders in economic enterprises and industrial attempts. A family is capable of realising that it has a common future wellbeing which far transcends the present individual interest of any or all of its members. To that future this present may be sacrificed indefinitely. Hence sustained effort, long accumulation of results, instead of their immediate consumption, and success, year by year, put out, as it were, to compound interest. The labour of its members, moreover, during their youth, while training is incomplete, is placed freely at the disposal of the whole. In a large family, this is an increasing asset, for the number of its cadets is continually receiving additions, and the youth, on their side, are well repaid for their patience under training by the consciousness that no secret will in the end be withheld from them; that no responsibility will be refused, that their personal interests and those of the firm are undissolubly united.

In Europe, where the individual stands directly related to the civitas, without the intervention of the family, it is only in modern times that the value of kinship as the basis of business association is beginning to be understood. This is a reaction which has been rendered inevitable by the breakdown of all the older forms of cooperation. For we constantly fail to see that an era of vast combinations is really an era of the decadence of combination per se. A commercial trust, for instance is rendered possible by the gradual consolidation of thousands of smaller enterprises. But once formed the trust destroys all its smaller competitors, and when the time comes for its own disintegration and exhaustion, it is a question whether the art it represents may not be lost to humanity, so long and so successfully has it guarded its trade secrets, so thoroughly has it inured its customers to doing nothing for themselves and having everything served out to them in bottles and tins; so contemptible has it made the small machine in place of the large, and the home-made in place of the patented. Thus an era of trusts is an era of the decadence of all that made trusts possible. Like the aloe, this flower destroys the tree that mothered it, and death, from unsuspected impoverishment is the immediate result of a moment of brilliant life.

The virtues of family organisation have always been understood in the East, where we see them perpetuated on a large scale in the caste with its hereditary occupations. True to her own genius, however, Europe instinctively made the effort to unite in a single enterprise members of widely different families, while at the same time giving to the art or trade concerned all the advantages of protracted discipline and long-deferred individualistic gains. Thus we have the trade-guilds of the Middle Ages, with their system of apprenticeships; and the "schools" of fine art of the Italian cities.

With the advent of the machine, individual skill suddenly appeared unimportant as an element in industrial success, and the system of guilds and apprenticeships broke down. The world of enterprise resolved itself into capital and labour, exploiter and exploited, a single machine-owner and a multitude of machine-tenders. Under this classification men no longer stood contrasted in the relationship of father and children, patriarch and dependents or master-craftsman and apprentices. Their lines of unity and division now became those of self-interest alone. The firm took the place of the old-time 'school.' The making of a fortune tends to become the object of ambition, instead of the acquisition of personal skill and common fame and for the vast majority, reduced to the position of units in a department, no ambition even of this meanest kind was any longer possible. The bettering of their own condition in any degree becomes as impossible for these, as the elevation of every private soldier in a regiment to the rank of a commissioned officer. Thus the war of interests superseded the co-operation of gifts, and at the same time the aggregative instinct began to be undermined by individual hopelessness.

The family is the basis of simpler forms and degrees of organisation, but it is vastly more permanent than the commune as a motif. For its impulse recurs spontaneously in every generation and every direction. And the exhaustion of the communes sees no exhaustion of the family, as an organising unit.

Wherever self-interest was to be the moralised ultimate binding-power, Indian society graduated that self-interest by combining with it the idea of the family. Europe, on the contrary—never vividly conscious of the family at all,—leapt at once to the attempt at a more complex type of cooperation, for which she drew the elements from all parts of the civic communes at will. The family may have been the starting-point of the crew, but the seed was soon forgotten in the fruit, and the crew became the model for new organisations. The more complex unit thus arrived at could attempt tasks far transcending the energy and initiative of the more conservative family group, but it had less vitality and persistence in face of adverse conditions. The accumulating emphasis thus laid on the family in all its aspects, has had a great share in giving to the East its air of statuesque stability.

Even in India, however, there have been other forms of organisation, the Rajput clans, the military confederacy of the Mahrattas, the samaj or church, and the all dominating unit of the master and his disciples, giving birth to the religious order. East or West, this last is the supreme form of cooperation. Here alone can egotism be sunk entirely, in the realisation of an idea. Here alone is self-interest eliminated altogether, for the future as for the past. Here the whole purpose is in the work itself. Whatever accrues from a given effort, whether added experience or increased means or heightened skill, is at once poured back into the common fund, and used as basis for the next undertaking. The West has grasped the fact of the adaptability of non-kindred to each other, and has sought to use it for the realisation of a good that lies more or less within the senses. The sight of the great Guru, passing over his own son, in the quest for a disciple of greater promise, is not startling to the European mind. The tailor or the banker, in the West, would be apt to do as much. But in such undertakings as theirs there is always, sooner or later, a profit-sharing, by which the gains accumulated are distributed. In the monastic order alone, there is no division of the spoils. It is this which makes monasticism so powerful for whatever end it proposes to itself. For building, for tasks of education, for industrial enterprises, it has no rival and the work that it does changes the face of the whole earth. Its fruit was not eaten by the worker, but was given to the world, and work so given endures for ever.

In India the time has come for the exploitation of the ideals of the forefathers. Exploitation means realisation. In this sense the blossom represents the exploitation of the plant. By means of renunciation, we are enabled to realise, or capitalise, or exploit, our gathered forces of character and experience. Similarly, we have now to take those powers and ideals of cooperation that made Ajanta and Kenhari and began Ellora, and exploit them on behalf of the civic unity.

Europe has to learn from India of the sanctity of the family, of the sweetness of self-suppression, and the holiness of faithful widowhood. But India on the other hand, has to study the virtues of Europe; the ready cooperation and warm love of those who are only comrades and not kindred; the emotional strength and self-restraint of the individual; and above all, the unfaltering discipline that looks so like servitude, yet is, in free persons, the finest flower of freedom.

Having these two opposites in one hand,—the civic commune for Europe, the family for India—we can begin to tabulate those elements of each which the other most needs. In Europe the family is affected by the conceptions of the civic life; in India, ideas proper only to the family tend to be imported into the civic life itself. A certain degree of this will probably prove persistent, giving in each case its national colour to the public life. But in the struggle for the realisation of new ideals we must work in each case to achieve the complement of the inborn tendency. Europe must strive to assimilate the culture of the family, India must individualise the whole civic consciousness. The place where we are, it has been said, is the only place in the whole universe towards which we cannot move. Similarly, the evolution already reached is the very thing we are to transcend. We must not rest in the thing we have achieved.

The Indian idea of personal freedom is an idea developed in the family, connoting the freedom of the unit, as seen against the communal background of infinite patience and love. The whole Indian character is adjusted to this conception. By the fervent co-operation of the whole race, during thousands of years, for its realisation, those deep insights have been gained into God and love and human tenderness which make Indian poetry and philosophy so wonderful and so compelling. Even wilfulness and rebellion imply the faith that he against whom I sin, is inalienably mine.

How marvellous is this truth! The saints, in Europe, have had glimpses of it. Says St. Teresa: "As the fish lives and moves and breathes in water, so is it true that we live and move and even sin, in God." But this is a flash of illumination, a single heart, or a moment of ecstatic inspiration. In India, a nation understands it. A deep ocean of love, consciously realised, in spite of all the haughtiness of the minnows swimming on its surface, is the explanation of the life of the Indian family.

But this marvellous vision is concomitant to a spoilt-child ideal of personal freedom for which the civic life has no place. The whims and caprice that are so beautiful to the lover, would be intolerable to the kindest and warmest of fellow citizens or fellow-soldiers. Unbroken self-restraint is the essential condition to be fulfilled by those who would practise a civic constructiveness. Here comes in the importance of etiquette, as the protection of the public life. Europeans practise the severest forms of etiquette in the family itself; the you employed by them between brothers, and sisters corresponds to apni; and they cannot understand why there should be rudeness to one we love. The Indian, on the contrary, would be cut to the heart by formality and distance of manners from his intimates; and would feel that this showed a desire to set him outside a barrier. These two opposite ways of feeling come from the dominance of the civitas and the family respectively. The two peoples approach the question of manner from opposite extremes. Yet the fact remains, that the evolution of strict forms of etiquette is a necessity to the growth of a great public life. The common citizen of the future must have the training that at present is peculiar to kings. Wherever we look, we shall see that etiquette and the civic life go together. The civilisation of Islam is based on an intertribal intercourse which demanded constant courtesy. Hence the stateliness of Mahomedan manners. The Yellow Races have a genius for etiquette, and a genius also for civic organisation. Ancient Rome, the most constructive power ever seen in history, owed much to her inheritance of yellow blood. Indian nationality can only be the result of warm and constant cooperation between persons of various provinces, faiths, castes and races. Such intercourse demands in the first place an exquisite regard for others and a stern respect for self. Every institution carries its own idealism. To him who worships the civitas, the disciplined character is the ideal. Chaotic disobedience is contemptible, worthy only of the sub-human. True freedom is seen as self-control, self-direction, and sustained power of self-surrender. Obedience to the right person must be instinctive, unbroken; submission to the wrong must never occur. To bring up a disobedient child would be a disgrace. Yet the fruit of this early training is not to be servility, but discrimination and responsibility; that is to say, in every act of obedience there is to be freedom, an appraisal of the lawfulness of the authority and the righteousness of the act required.

To him who worships the civitas, again, there is a whole series of new relationships created, round which his emotions and his imagination centre. Names like leader, comrade, follower, fellow-citizen, countryman, fellow-worker now become instinct with life. It is no longer necessary, or even desirable, to call a man brother in order to show one's devotion to him. The vocabulary is enriched. One loves an elder brother; but follows one's captain to the very scaffold. Pride arises in one's own courage and dogged sense of discipline. One rejoices in the consciousness of a cold and reserved exterior, beneath which burn volcanic fires.

Manu makes clear enough what is to be the overwhelming virtue of the civic life. It is the passion for justice. For we must remember that the citizen is the king democratised. Even as the Brahmin is the ideal, for those whose only conception of social forms is the church, or samaj, so the Kshatriya becomes the type for those who would realise the civitas. Dharma, justice, the national righteousness is the philosophy of the public life. Its thakoor is the banner; earth and water its holiest symbols; the 'People and the Soil' the watchword in every heart.

Such are the developments that have to be added to the evolution which India has already attained. And on her side what she has achieved is now to be imparted to the world. The perpetual alternation of opposites is the law of the universe, and an alternation of ideals includes in its realisation all that is noble.

Goddess Leda who from heaven descendest, how beautiful are thy feet as they gild the morning. The roses of Earth are red, but the touch of vermilion with which thy feet stain the heavens, is redder.—it is the crimson of love, the glory of passion.

Goddess Leda, look down upon men with gracious eyes. The clang of war is stilled, silent the hiss of the shafts and the shields clamour no more against each other in the shock of the onset. We have hung up our swords on the walls of our mansions. The young men have returned unhurt, the girls of Asilon cry through the corn sweet and high to the hearts of their lovers.

Goddess Leda, lady of laughter, lady of bliss! in the chambers of love, in the song of the bridal, in the gardens and by the delightful streams where boy and girl look into each other's eyes, speak low to the heart, enter in. Drive out hatred, drive out wrath. Let love embrace the world and silence the eager soul of strife with kisses.

URIU.

The song of Turiu is beautiful, but the chant of Uriu is mighty. Listen to the Hymn of Tanyth.

Tanyth, terrible Mother! laced with a garland of skulls, thou that drinkest the blood of the victim upon the altar loud with the death-shriek, mighty and merciless Mother!

Tanyth, thou in the shock of the fighting, with the raucous cry that rises high and drowns the crash of the car and the roar of the battle,—blood-stained, eager and terrible, pitiless, huge and swift,—wonderful, adorable Mother!

Hear me! I who fear thee not, I who love thee, ask of thee, art thou weary, art thou satiate now with the blood of the foe and the flesh of the victims? Why has it sunk to rest, the thunder of war in Asilon, land of the mighty?

I am not weary, I am not satiate. I charge thee, awake and give me again delight of the slaughter, trampling the face of the fallen foe as I scatter with shafts the ranks that boasted and shouted, forgetting that Uriu fought in the van of the battle.

Mother, arise! leave to Leda her gardens and delicate places, the faces lovely and smooth of Asilon's boys and the joyous beauty of women. I am old and grey in the council and battle. She has nothing for me; what shall I do with her boon of peace and her promptings of love and beauty?

Mother, arise, Tanyth the terrible! shake the world with thy whisper, loom in the heavens, madden men's hearts with the thirst of blood, the rapture of death and the joy of the killing. We will give thee thy choice of the captives, women and men to fall and to bleed on thy altar.

Tanyth, lady of death, queen of the battle! there is a joy in the clash of death that is more than woman's sweet embrace, a pleasure in pain that the touch of her lips cannot give us; lovelier far is the body torn by the spears than her white limbs covered with shining gems. Tanyth's skulls are more than the garland upon thy breasts, O Leda.

TURIU.

It is great, Uriu, master of war and song, but mine too is beautiful. It is long since we met in the temples and marketplaces of Asilon. Ages have rolled by and the earth is changed, Prince of the Asa.

URIU.

I have lived in the heavens of the great where we fight all day and meet to feast in the evening.

TURIU.

And I in gardens of love and song where the sea murmurs low on flower-skirted beaches. But the time comes when I must go down and take up again the song and the sweetness in mortal places of pleasure.

URIU.

I also go down, for the warrior too is needed and not only the poet and lover.

TURIU.

The world is changed, Uriu, Prince of the Asa. Thou wilt not get again the joy of slaughter and pitilessness. Men have grown merciful, full of tenderness and shrinking.

URIU.

I know not. What Tanyth gives me to do, that I will do. If there were no sternness, no grimness in the world that she creates, I should not be called.

TURIU.

We will go down together and see what this world is in which after so many millions of years we are again wanted.

A SYSTEM OF NATIONAL EDUCATION.

CHAPTER II THE POWERS OF THE MIND.

The instrument of the educationist is the mind or antahkarana, which consists of four layers. The reservoir of past mental impressions, the chitta or storehouse of memory, which must be distinguished from the specific act of memory, is the foundation on which all the other layers stand. All experience lies within us as passive or potential memory; active memory selects and takes what it requires from that storehouse. But the active memory is like a man searching among a great mass of locked-up material; sometimes he cannot find what he wants; often in his rapid search he stumbles across many things for which he has no immediate need; often too he blunders and thinks he has found the real thing when it is something else, irrelevant if not valueless, on which he has laid his hand. The passive memory or chitta needs no training, it is automatic and naturally sufficient to its task; there is not the slightest object of knowledge coming within its field which is not secured, placed and faultlessly preserved in that admirable receptacle. It is the active memory, a higher but less perfectly developed function, which is in need of improvement.

The second layer is the mind proper or manas, the sixth sense of our Indian psychology, in which all the others are gathered up. The function of the mind is to receive the images of things translated into sight, sound, smell, taste and touch the five senses and translate these again into thought-sensations. It receives also images of its own direct grasping and forms them into mental impressions. These sensations and impressions are the material of thought, not thought itself; but it is exceedingly important that thought should work on sufficient and perfect material. It is therefore, the first business of the educationist to develop in the child the right use of the six senses, to see that they are not stunted or injured by disuse, but trained by the child himself under the teacher's direction to that perfect accuracy and keen subtle sensitiveness of which they are capable. In addition, whatever assistance can be gained by the organs of action, should be thoroughly employed. The hand, for instance, should be trained to reproduce what the eye sees and the mind senses. The speech should be trained to the perfect expression of the knowledge which the whole antahkarana possesses.

The third layer is the intellect or buddhi, which is the real instrument of thought and that which orders and disposes of the knowledge acquired by the other parts of the machine. For the purposes of the educationist this is infinitely the most important of the three I have named. The intellect is an organ composed of several groups of functions, divisible into two important classes, the functions and faculties of the right hand and the functions or faculties of the left hand. The faculties of the right hand are comprehensive, creative and synthetic; the faculties of left hand critical and analytic. To the right hand belong Judgment, Imagination, Memory, Observation; to the left hand Comparison and Reasoning. The critical faculties distinguish, compare, classify, generalise, deduce, infer, conclude; they are the components parts of the logical reason. The right-hand faculties comprehend, command, judge in their own right, grasp, hold and manipulate. The right-hand mind is the master of knowledge, the left-hand its servant. The left hand touches only the body of knowledge, the right-hand penetrates its soul. The left hand limits itself to ascertained truth, the right hand grasps that which is still elusive or unascertained. Both are essential to the completeness of the human reason. These important functions of the machine have all to be raised to their highest and finest working-power, if the education of the child is not to be imperfect and one-sided.

There is a fourth layer of faculty which, not as yet entirely developed in man, is attaining gradually to a wider development and more perfect evolution. The powers peculiar to this highest stratum of knowledge are chiefly known to us from the phenomena of genius,—sovereign discernment, intuitive perception of truth, plenary inspiration of speech, direct vision of knowledge to an extent often amounting to revelation, making a man a prophet of truth. These powers are rare in their higher development, though many possess them imperfectly or by flashes. They are still greatly distrusted by the critical reason of mankind because of the admixture of error, caprice and a biassed imagination which obstructs and distorts their perfect workings. Yet it is clear that humanity could not have advanced to its present stage if it had not been for the help of these faculties, and it is a question with which educationists have not yet grappled, what is to be done with this mighty and baffling element, the element of genius in the pupil. The mere instructor does his best to discourage and stifle genius, the more liberal teacher welcomes it. Faculties so important to humanity cannot be left out of our consideration. It is foolish to neglect them, it is criminal to discourage them. Their imperfect development must be perfected, the admixture of error, caprice and biassed fancifulness must be carefully and wisely removed. But the teacher cannot do it; he would eradicate the good corn as well as the tares if he interfered. Here, as in all educational operations, he can only put the growing soul into the way of its own perfection.

BAJI PURBHOU.

NOTE—This poem is founded on the historical incident of the heroic self-sacrifice of Baji Purbhou Deshpande, who to cover Shivaji's retreat, held the pass of Rangana for two hours with a small company of men against twelve thousand Moguls. Beyond the single fact of this great exploit there has been no attempt to preserve historical accuracy.—AUROBINDO GHOSE.

A noon of Deccan with its tyrant glare
Oppressed the world; the hills stood deep in haze,
And sweltering athirst the fields glared up
Longing for water in the courses parched
Of streams long dead. Nature and man alike,
Imprisoned by a bronze and brilliant sky,
Sought an escape from that wide trance of heat.
Nor only on inanimate hills and trees,
Nor on rare herdsman or the patient hind
Tilling the earth or tending sleeplessly
The well-eared grain, that burden fell. It hung Upon the Mogul horsemen as they rode
With lances at the charge, the surf of steel
About them and behind, as they recoiled
Or circled, where the footmen ran and fired,
And fired again and ran; "For now at last,"
They deemed, "the war is over, now at last
The panther of the hills is beaten back Right to his lair, the rebel crew to death
Is hunted, and an end is made at last."
Therefore they stayed not for the choking dust,
The slaying heat, the thirst of wounds and fight,
The stumbling stark fatigue, but onward pressed
With glowing eyes. Far otherwise the foe,
Panting and sore oppressed and racked with thirst
And blinded with the blazing earth who reeled
Backward to Raigurh, moistening with their blood
Their mother, and felt their own beloved hills
A nightmare hell of death and heat, the sky
A mute and smiling witness of their dire
Anguish,—abandoned now of God and man,
Who for their country and their race had striven,—
In vain, it seemed. At morning when the sun
Was yet below the verge, the Bhonsle sprang
At a strong mountain fortress, hoping so
To clutch the whole wide land into his grasp;
But from the north and east the Moguls poured,
Swords numberless and hooves that shook the hills
And barking of a hundred guns. These bore
The hero backward. Silently with set
And quiet faces grim drew fighting back
The strong Mahrattas to their hills; only
Their rear sometimes with shouted slogan leaped
At the pursuer's throat, or on some rise
Or covered vantage stayed the Mogul flood
A moment. Ever foremost where men fought,
Was Baji Purbhou seen, like a wild wave
Of onset or a cliff against the surge.

At last they reached a tiger-throated gorge
Upon the way to Raigurh. Narrowing there
The hills draw close, and their forbidding cliffs Threaten the prone incline. The Bhonsle paused;
His fiery glance travelled in one swift gyre
Hill, gorge and valley and with speed returned Mightily, like an eagle on the wing
To the dark youth beside him, Malsure
The younger, with his bright and burning eyes,

Who wordless rode, quivering, as on the leath;
 His fierce heart hungered for the rear, where Death
 Was ringing mid the laughter of the swords.
 "Ride, Suryaji," the Chieftain cried, his look Intent with purpose, "hither from the rear Summon the Purbhou." Turning with the word
 Suryaji's hooves sped down the rock-strewn slope
 Into the trenchant valley deep. Swiftly,
 Though burdened with a nation's fate, the ridge
 They reached, where in stern silence fought and fell,
 Their iron hearts broken with desperate toil,
 The Southron rear, and to the Purbhou gave
 The summons of the Chief; "Ride, Baji, ride,
 The Bhonale names thee, Baji." The Purbhou spoke
 No word, but stormed with loose and streaming rain
 To the high frowning gorge and silent stood Before his leader. "Baji, more than once
 In battle thou hast stood, a living shield,
 Between me and the foe. But more today,
 O Baji, save than any single life,—
 Thy nation's destiny. Thou seest this gorge
 Narrow and fell and gleaming like the throat
 Of some huge tiger, with its rocky fangs
 Agrin for food; and though the lower slope
 Descends too gently, yet with roots and stones
 'Tis hampered, and the higher prone descent
 Impregably forbids assault; too steep
 The sides for any to ascend and shoot
 From vantage. Here might lionhearted men,
 Though few, delay a host. Baji, I speed
 To Raigurh and in two brief hours return.
 Say with what force thy iron heart can hold
 This passage till I come. Thou seest our strength,
 How it has melted like the Afghan's ice
 Into a pool of blood." And while he paused
 Who had been chosen, spoke an iron man
 With iron brows who rode behind the Chief,
 Tanaji Malsure, that living sword:
 "Not for this little purpose was there need
 To call the Purbhou from his toil. Enough,
 Give me five hundred men; I hold the pass Till thy return." But Shivaji kept still
 His great and tranquil look upon the face
 Of Baji Purbhou. Then, all black with wrath,
 Wrinkling his fierce hard eyes, the Malsure;
 "What ponders then the hero? Such a man
 Of men, he needs not like us petty swords
 A force behind him, but alone will hold
 All Rajasthan and Agra and Cabool
 From rise to set." The Purbhou answered him:
 "Tanaji Malsure, not in this living net
 Of flesh and nerve, nor in the flickering mind
 Is a man's manhood seated. God within Rules us, who in the Brahmin and the dog
 Can, if He will, show equal godhead. Not
 By men is mightiness achieved; Baji
 Or Malsure, tis but a name, a robe,
 And covers One alone. We but employ
 Bhavani's strength, who in an arm of flesh
 Is mighty as in the thunder and the storm.
 I ask for fifty swords." And Malsure;
 "Well, Baji; I will build thee such a pyre
 As man had never yet, when we return;
 For all the Deccan brightening shall cry out
 'Baji the Purbhou burns.' And with a smile

Watched of the mountains in the silent gorge.

INDIA'S NEED.

The following passages are quoted from the reply to the address presented to Swami Vivekananda, by the Calcutta Reception Committee after his long journey from the West:—

SWAMI'S LOVE FOR INDIA— HIS COUNTRY.

"One wants, to lose the universal in the individual. One renounces, flies off, and tries to cut himself off from all associations of the body, of the past, one works hard to forget even that he is a man; yet, in the heart of his heart, there is a soft sound, one string vibrating, one whisper, which tells him, East or West, home is best. Citizens of the capital of this empire, before you I stand not as a sanyasin, no, not even as a preacher, but I come before you the same Calcutta boy to talk to you as I used to do. Aye, I would like to sit upon the dust of the streets of this city, and, with the freedom of childhood, talk to you my mind, my brothers. Accept, therefore, my heart-felt thanks for this unique word that you have used, 'Brother.' Yes; I am your brother, you are my brothers. I was asked by an English friend on the eve of my departure, 'Swami, how do you like now your motherland after four years' experience of the luxurious, glorious, powerful West? I could only answer 'India I loved before I came away. Now the very dust of India has become holy to me, the very air is now to me holy, it is now the holy land, the place of pilgrimage, the Fatherland.'

SWAMI'S LOVE FOR HIS MASTER.

Gentlemen you have touched another heart of my heart, the deepest of all, that is the mention of my teacher, my master, my hero, my ideal, my God in life—Sri Ramakrishna Paramahansa. If there has been anything achieved by me by thoughts or word, or deeds, if from my lips ever has fallen one word that has touched anyone in the world, I beg no credit to it, it was His. But if there have been words falling from my lips, if there has been hatred coming out of me, it is mine, and not His. All that has been good has been mine. All that has been life giving, strengthening, pure, and holy has been His inspiration, His words and He Himself. Yes, my friends, yet the world has to know that man. We read in the history of the world of prophets and their lives coming down to us through centuries of writings and workings by their disciples; through thousands of years of smoothening and plastering the lives of great prophets of yore come down to us; and yet, in my opinion, not one stands as high in brilliance as that life which I saw with my own eyes under whose shadow I had lived; at whose feet I have learnt everything, the life of Ramakrishna Paramahansa. Aye, friend you all know the celebrated saying of the Gita—Yada Yada hi—

MANIFESTATION OF THE DIVINE.

Along with it you have to understand one thing more. Such a thing is before us to-day, before one of these tidal waves of spirituality comes, these are little whirlpools of a similar nature all over society. One of these stands up, at first unknown, unperceived and unthought of, assuming proportion swallowing, as it were, and assimilating all the other little whirlpools, becoming immense, becoming a tidal wave and falling upon society with a power which none can resist. Such is happening. If you have eyes you can read it. If your heart is open you will receive it. If you are truth-seekers, you will find it. Blind, blind indeed is the man, who does not see the signs of the day. Aye, this boy born of poor Brahmin parents in some wayside village somewhere of which very few of you have even heard, is literally being worshipped in lands which have been fulminating against heathen worship for centuries. Whose power is it? Is it mine, or yours? It is none else than the power which was manifested here as Ramakrishna Paramahansa. For, you and I and sages and prophets, nay, even incarnations, the whole universe are but manifestations of power more or less individualised, more or less concentrated. Here has been a manifestation of an immense power, just the very beginnings of whose workings we are seeing, and before this generation passes away, you will see more wonderful workings of that power. It has come just in time for the regeneration of India. For we forget from time to time the vital power that must always work in India.

INDIA WANTS SPIRITUAL HEROES.

We want spiritual ideals before us. We want enthusiastically to gather round grand spiritual names. Our heroes must be spiritual. Such a hero has been given unto us in the person of Ramakrishna Paramahansa. If this nation wants to rise, take my word, it will have to come enthusiastically round this name. It does not matter, who preaches Ramakrishna Paramahansa, whether I, or you, or anybody. But Him I place before you, and it is for you to judge, and for the good of our race, for the good of our nation, to judge now, what you shall do with this great ideal of life. One thing we are to remember, that it was the purest of all lives, that you have ever seen, or let me tell you distinctly, that you have read of. And it is a fact before you that it is the most marvellous manifestation of soul-power that you can read of, much less expect to see. Within ten years of His passing away this power has encircled the globe, that is before you. Gentlemen, in duty bound, therefore, for the good of our race, for the good of our religion, I place this great spiritual ideal before you. Judge Him not through me. I am only a weak instrument. Let not His character be judged by seeing me. It was so great, that I or any one of his disciples, if we spent hundreds of lives, could not do justice to a millionth part of what He really was. Judge for yourselves; in the heart of your hearts is the Eternal Witness, and may the same Ramkrishna Paramahansa, for the good of our nation, for the welfare of our country, and for the good of humanity, open your hearts, make you true and steady to work for the immense change, which must come, whether we work or not. For the work of the Lord does not wait for the likes of you or me. He can raise His workers from the dust by hundreds and thousands. It is a glory and a privilege that we are allowed to work at all under Him.

THE TEACHING OF SWAMI VIVEKANANDA

The New Thought, an American journal publishes the following: This shows how rapidly the Vedantic thoughts are spreading over that country.

During the World's Fair there came to Chicago Swami Vivekananda, a teacher of the Vedanta philosophy, which is the world's oldest religion. He was the most most interesting figure at that most famous Congress of Religions which formed such a notable feature of the World's Fair of 1893. His picturesque attire, yellow turban, and beautiful face, attracted the attention of every one who passed him. He was physical ly more beautiful than most men; and mentally, more fascinating. He had a rich musical voice and a magnetic personality. Those who attended his lectures were deeply impressed with his eloquence. Coming from India, a country of romance and mysticism, his lectures were replete with Oriental imagery. He gave an impetus to Vedanta movement which has since become widespread in America.

Swami Vivekananda came to us with a message. He taught the greatness of the philosophy of India. He taught the secrets of health and happiness, as attained through a well-ordered, spiritual life. He gave the message that strengthened those who were discouraged. He gave the student new aspirations. He enlarged men's narrow views and imbued them with a broader comprehension of duty.

The Swami was a disciple of the Mahatma, Ramakrishna. There is an interesting story about this great Yogi which gives an insight into the powerful influence of this philosophy or religion over the mind of its devotee. As a small child, Ramakrishna was made a temple priest in the temple of the Mother of Bliss, at Kali. There he sang and wept and prayed to the Goddess of the Hindus and served the silent image with flowers. The boy became possessed of a great desire to know if there was really a Mother of Bliss in the universe. Day after day and night after night he prayed and wept calling upon her to manifest herself to him, which, in time she did. The people of the neighborhood thought him mad, and to divert his mind married him to a young girl of five years. The marriage was in reality a betrothal, and Ramakrishna, in the transports of his spirit, forgot her, until several years afterwards she stood before him in the perfection of beauty. Falling at her feet, he cried: "I have revered all women as mother, but I am at your service." However, the young bride refused to recall the soul of her husband to earth, and became one of his most ardent disciples.

Swami Vivekananda possessed an earnestness that stimulated enthusiasm in the minds of his students. "Are you mad after truth?" was one of the questions he would ask of those who sought to become initiates of the Vedanta philosophy and partakers in its beatitudes. He taught the preliminary virtues of unselfishness, purity, the forgiveness of injuries, faith in the invisible ideal, and worship of the Father-Mother whose dwelling is in the Spiritual Soul of humanity.

If it be true that nature is uniform in all her works—and so far no human experience has contradicted it—if it be true that the same law prevails throughout the universe, then, as it has been said in the Vedas: "Knowing one lump of clay we know the nature of all the clay that is in the universe." Take up one little plant and study its life and learn of its mystery, and we know the universe.

The Swami taught that everything exists throughout eternity; that nothing can be created or destroyed, in the sense of coming out of nothing, or of going back to nothing. Only the movement is in succeeding waves and hollows, going back to fine forms, coming out into large proportions. The bird springs from the egg, becomes a beautiful bird, lives its life, then dies, leaving only other eggs, seeds of future birds. So with animals so, with men. Everything begins from certain seeds, certain rudiments, certain fine forms becomes grosser and grosser, and develops; goes on that way for a certain time, again goes back to that fine form, and subsides. The raindrop in which the beautiful sunbeam is playing, has been drawn up in the form of vapor from the ocean, goes far away into the air, reaches the mountain; then it changes into snow, again into water again rolls back down through hundreds of miles to the mother ocean. So with everything in nature. This earth has come out of nebulous form becoming colder and colder throwing up this crystallized form upon which we live; and in the future will become colder and colder until it dies, and will break into pieces, will be pulverized, go back into rudimentary nebulous fine form. This is happening before us today. This has been happening through time immemorial. This is the whole history of man, the whole history of nature, the whole history of life.

The last to come in the order of creation is intelligence. At the beginning intelligence becomes involved, and in the end intelligence gets evolved. The sum-total of the intelligence displayed in the universe must, therefore, be the involved universal intelligence unfolding itself. This universal cosmic intelligence is the Supreme Lord. It is He who is shining as the sun and the stars; He comes as gentle showers He is the ocean. He is the mother earth. He comes as gentle wind that we breathe. He is the strength of man walking in the pride of youth. He is love and devotion in the heart of woman.

Swami Vivekananda taught that we reap what we sow! that we are the makers of our fate. None else has the blame none has the praise. Divine Power is open to everyone, at all times, in all places, under all conditions. Upon us depends how we use it. Blame none for your own faults, and take the whole responsibility upon yourself. Good thoughts and good deeds will bring to your aid unlimited power to defend you always and ever. Through the practice of Yoga one attains to self-mastery and learns the secret of focusing the energies of life, which may be applied practically, lovingly and patiently to human needs. Such was the teaching of Swami Vivekananda.

SECTION 1 :—SCIENCE AND ART IN RELIGION.

Science and Art are twin sisters in every department of mental culture. In fact the whole of modern civilization consists of the two. In cultivating knowledge of the material world, one portion of the study is distinctly scientific, and another portion a matter of art. Take for instance the study of Chemistry; what is studied in the class-room in the shape of learning principles, laws and formulae is science. What is done in the laboratory is Art. As regards the cultivation of the knowledge of the mental and moral sphere of life, it may not be usual to carry on studies separately on the two lines, but it may be so carried on and ought to be. There are men however who would grudge to give religion a locus standi of its own in the sphere of science and art. They, however, are ready to test it by the data and facts of physical science, with a view to dismiss it as something baseless. But many would willingly admit the claim of religion to be the subject of science on its own data and facts. But a mere science of religion is a thing too lame to represent the whole truth of what is called religion. To represent the whole truth of it, the experience of those who practise religion should be put side by side with the science of religion. In other words religious Science and religious Art should go together in order to substantiate the truth of religion. In fact, it is the art of religion which is religion proper. For, the word religion without any qualification means the experiences of a man of religion. If one wants to test the truths of religion he must honestly and earnestly ascertain not only the soundness of certain propositions and postulates affecting religion, but the force and result of what one experiences in practising religion. In medicine the clinical experience is often more useful than theoretical descriptions, in determining the properties of a drug. If one knows the science regarding an object, he only knows the qualities and character of that object. But one who has reduced the qualities of the object to some practical purpose in the shape of an art has appreciated and felt it. For instance, if one knows the science of heat, he is no doubt able to discuss about heat. But it is quite a different thing to be able to produce heat and fire. This requires some sort of tactics and experience which may be called the art of producing heat. Such tactics and experience may be various, but it is either by actually producing fire or by feeling it by touch that a man gets actual experience of what fire is. The scientist knows that every substance contains heat in it. But the practical man who requires fire, actually gets it produced by some shift or other, say, by rubbing two pieces of wood. This is art causing an effect which cannot but be home-felt and real. Similarly, one may have knowledge of the science of chemistry without ever having been in the laboratory. Such a person can have no experience of chemical action though he may have a knowledge of some of its laws. Take again the case of electricity. A scientific knowledge of electricity no doubt widens the range of human knowledge regarding nature. But it is the various electric arts to which mankind owes the manifold blessings of modern civilization.

Thus a complete treatment of a particular religious system must involve a consideration of the science portion and the art portion of that religious system. In many systems the two factors are not distinctly recognized. But the Hindu system distinctly recognises the dual phase and this recognition is the distinguishing features of it.

Cheap Edition of KARMAYOGIN.

The difficulty felt by
many students and educated men of small means in
buying the KARMAYOGIN
at its ordinary price of two annas, has been so much pressed on our attention
that we have found it necessary to bring out a cheaper edition at one anna a copy.
It is not an easy thing in this country to establish a weekly review of this standard written in English,
and it has therefore been necessary for us at the outset to place a price on the paper which should ensure its being self-supporting even with a limited circulation. The KARMA-
YOGIN, however, is now
sufficiently successful to allow of a concession of this kind being made without financial injury. The subscribers to the superior edition will be compensated
by the superior get-up and
paper, while the cheaper edition will remove the grievance of the large number who have hitherto been debarred from reading the review by their scanty
means.

PASSING THOUGHTS.

Great Consequences.

The events that sway the world are often the results of trivial circumstances. When immense changes and irresistible movements are in progress, it is astonishing how a single event, often a chance event, will lead to a train of circumstances that alter the face of a country or the world. At such times a slight turn this way or that produces results out of all proportion to the cause. It is on such occasions that we feel most vividly the reality of a Power which disposes of events and deferts the calculations of men. The end of many things is brought about by the sudden act of a single individual. A world vanishes, another is created almost at a touch. Certainty disappears and we begin to realise what the pralaya of the Hindus, the passage from one age to another, really means and how true is the idea that it is by rapid transitions long-prepared changes are induced. Such a change now impends all over the world, and in almost all countries events are happening, the final results of which the actors do not foresee. Small incidents pass across the surface of great countries and some of them pass and are forgotten, others precipitate the future. In England, in Prussia, in Greece, still more in Turkey, Persia and China a slight movement of one or two men may be sufficient at the present moment to alter the destinies of the country.

The Egyptian Murder.

The assassination of Boutros Pasha in Egypt has the chance of being one of these momentous events. In itself it is an incident which has happened in many countries without disturbing the march of ordinary events. The lives of rulers are always open to this peril from the fanatic, the personal enemy with a grudge, the crank or the lunatic. In England itself the lives of ruling men or princes have been taken or attempted. But these are not ordinary times and Egypt is not in a normal condition. Hitherto the Egyptian question has not been acute. There is a strong Nationalist sentiment which grows with time, the Denshaw incident has left wounds behind, but, beyond the mere fact of the presence of the foreigner, there seems to be no specific grievance which could give intensity of feeling or a formidable shape to the vague discontent and the perfectly natural general aspiration. If the virtual ruler of Egypt is well advised, the act of a solitary assassin need not provide anything but a few days unhealthily excitement—it need not be the spark in the powder magazine. But if Sir Eldon Gorst allows himself to be swayed into providing the Egyptian with specific causes of discontent he may succeed in adding an Egyptian difficulty to the permanent burdene of England. The minds of rulers at such seasons are moved rather by impulses beyond their control than by that calm thought which would guide them in ordinary times. We know what Lord Cromer would have done, it is to be seen what a higher Power impels Sir Eldon Gorst to do; for on the reception of an event and not on the event itself its consequences depend.

Great Preparations.

Conversely, at such times great preparations, at least in the initial stages of the change, lead to nothing or very little. Pompous associations, largely attended conferences, earnest and careful deliberations all end in smoke, they vanish, leaving no trace behind. This is largely because these great preparations either take their stand on the chimæra that the past can be restored, or they anchor themselves on the permanency of present conditions. But in these periods things move so rapidly that yesterday's conditions entirely disappear today and today's have no society of being in existence to-morrow. Under such circumstances the rule of the Gita becomes almost a necessity, to do one's duty according to one's lights and leave the results to God. For, when we attempt to see into the immediate uture, the one comment that suggests itself is in the Homeric phrase, "These things lie on the knees of the Gods."

Revelation in Jail.

Revelation is a thing Religion verfully asserts, Science as potentially denies. According to our ideas in this country, man has a faculty, latent in him but easily developed through the various means grouped under the expression sadhana, by which he is able to see spiritually and get the revelation of things not discernible by the reason. Sri Jyoti Krishna Kumar Mitra in relating his spiritual experiences in Agra jail dwelt on the revelation of the omnipresent and merciful God which is continually with him in his imprisonment. He had what we call the pratyaksha darshan. This is a thing the possibility of which our wise men trained in European enlightenment think it a very intellectual thing to deny. On a similar occasion the "Indian Social Reformer" sneered at the experience, declared that God reveals Himself only in His laws and, if we remember right, scoffed at the idea of such a revelation being given in such an inappropriate, disreputable and uncomfortable place as a jail. It is curious at least that not one out of many should have had this experience recently in precisely similar circumstances and that the various experiences should have been expressed in almost exactly the same terms. After all, an ounce of experience is worth a ton of theory. Our own belief is that the notions of the world are travelling towards a signal refutation of the atheistic and agnostic attitudes and that India is the place selected for the revelation. It is for this reason that these experiences are becoming so frequent in men who are rather men of action than what is generally known as purely religious men, that is to say, who seek God in life and the service of men and not merely in the closet and the astrum. A new religion summing up and correcting the old, a religion based not on dogma but on direct knowledge and experience, is the need of the age, and it is only India that can give it to the world.

THE PRINCIPLE OF EVIL.

The problem of evil is one that has taxed human thought and evolved various and conflicting solutions. To those who do not believe in anything but material, the problem does not exist. Everything is in nature as the result of evolution. Nature is blind and unintelligent and has therefore no conception of good or evil; the conception belongs to the human mind and is the result of the social sense and the ideas of pleasure and pain developed in human beings by a perfectly intelligible natural process. It is to men who believe in Intelligence as governing and developing the world that the problem exists. Why did evil come into existence and what is its purpose?

The unwillingness of the devout soul to admit that evil can have its existence in God, has led to variations of the Manichean theory which sees a double control in the world, God as the Principle of good and Satan as the Principle of evil. Those who regard the belief in the existence of an intelligent evil power as superstition, find the origin of evil in man who abuses his freedom and by his revolt and self-will gives birth to sin. This solution solves nothing, for it does not explain why there should have been a possibility of evil at all. Unless we limit our conception of God as the source and creator of all, that from which all proceeds, we must admit that evil as part of the economy of the world must have proceeded from Him no less than good. Even if we violently posit another creative force in the world limiting His universality, we shall have to assume that He, having the power to prevent evil, permits it; for He is omnipotent, and none can do anything except by the permission of His all-wise and overruling Providence. And if we limit the omnipotence of God, we reduce Him to a mere Demiurgus, a great Artificer of things struggling amongst forces over which He has not entire control. Such a conception is unphilosophical and contrary to the universal spiritual experience of mankind. The problem remains why, if He is God, All-Love, sarvaman-galam, He creates evil or, if He does not create it, permits it.

To our mind there is no escaping from the belief that, if God exists, He is All. All proceeds from Him from what other source can it proceed? All exists in Him; in what other being or continent can it exist? Therefore, evil must proceed from Him, evil must exist in Him. Since He is All-Wise, for all knowledge is His, it must exist for some wise and perfect purpose. Since He is All-Love, it must exist for good and not for anything which contradicts the good. Only, His is an infinite wisdom, ours a finite, His perfect, ours undeveloped. His is an infinite and all-wise love, ours a finite and unwise love, a love imperfectly informed by knowledge, full of maya, attachment to passing happiness and pleasure. God's love looks beyond, ours fixes its eyes on the moment.

Experience must always be the basis of true knowledge, but it must be experience illuminated by true perception, not experience dominated by surface impressions. The experience of the mind which has compassed calm and is able to preserve its tranquillity under the most strenuous assaults of pain, misfortune and evil, is alone worth having. The mind which is not dhira, which feels grief and thinks under the influence of affection and passion, even if it be noble affection and passion, cannot arrive at the samyak Jnanam, the complete and perfect truth. Emotion is for the heart, it should not besiege the intellect; for the proper business of the intellect is to observe and understand, not to be obscured by the slightest prejudice, the least trace of feeling. One who is dhira will look narrowly at every incident and, if he cannot see at once, wait for enlightenment as to its ultimate purpose and issue; so waiting, so calmly considering, the meaning of life dawns on the mind; an infinite purpose reveals itself in things small and great, in occurrences good and bad; omniscient Providence reveals itself in the fall of the sparrow and the death of the ant as well as in the earthquake that destroys great cities and the floods that make thousands destitute and homeless. Rudra and Shiva reveal themselves as one. The Yogin sees God in all things, not only in all beings but in all events. He is the flood, He is the earthquake, He is Death that leads to a higher life, He is Pain that prepares us for a higher bliss. This is a thing that cannot be argued; it has to be seen. Pūripashyanti dhīrah. And sight is only possible to the calm heart and the unperturbed understanding.

The materialist is not wrong when he holds good and evil to be merely operations of Nature which she uses impartially and without making a distinction, and that the distinction is an evolution in the human mind. Evil is good disintegrating to prepare for a higher good. That which is now tyranny, was once necessary to consolidate human society. What was once an ideal state of society, would now be barbarous and evil. Morality progresses, religion widens with the growing manifestation of that which is divine in the human race. As with the individual, so with the race and the world, evil tends to good, it comes into existence in order that men may reject the lesser good and rise to the higher.

The problem of pain remains. Was it necessary that the process should be accompanied with pain to the individual? At one time the capacity for pain, physical and mental, was infinitely less than it is now, so little that it might be pronounced to be nil. It is a remarkable fact that disease, pain and grief have grown keener with the growing fineness of the human organisation. Obviously this can only be a temporary development necessary to prepare a higher race which shall rise above pain to a higher capacity for pleasure and happiness. The lower organisation resisted the sanskara of pain and grief by the coarseness of its composition, it rejected pain in the sense of not knowing it. The higher organisation of the future will not be below it, but rise above it. It was the knowledge of good and evil that brought grief and sin into the world; when that knowledge is surmounted, man will rise above grief and sin. Before he eat the forbidden fruit, he had the innocence of the animal; when he shall cease to eat it, he will have the innocence of the God. Is it not so that in nature pain is a possibility which has to be exhausted and man has been selected as the instrument to bring it into existence, in a limited space, for a limited time, and work it out of the cosmos? In the light of this idea, the Christian doctrine of the Son of Man on the cross acquires a new significance and man himself becomes the Christ of the universe.

Another question occurs. Is pain real or a shadow? The Vedantist believes that the soul is a part of God or one with God Himself, and cannot feel pain or grief, but only ananda, bliss. The jiva or soul takes the rasa, the delight of the dualities, and it changes to bliss in his nature; but this is veiled by the ignorance that separates the jiva in his swarupa from the mind and the heart. Pain is a negative vikara or corruption of true experience in the mind, pleasure a positive vikara. The truth is ananda. But this is a knowledge for which mankind is not ready. Only the Yogin realises it and becomes sama, likeminded, to pain and pleasure, good or evil, happiness or misfortune. He takes the rasa of both and they give him strength and bliss; for the veil between his mind and his soul is removed and the apparent man in him has become one with the swarupa or real man. If mankind as a whole came too early by that knowledge, the evolution of the perfect good would be delayed. The utter sweetness of daya and prema, pity and love, might never be extracted from the lila.

A SYSTEM OF NATIONAL EDUCATION.

CHAPTER. III

THE MORAL NATURE.

In the economy of man, the mental nature rests upon the moral, and the education of the intellect divorced from the perfection of the moral and emotional nature is injurious to human progress. Yet, while it is easy to arrange some kind of curriculum or syllabus which will do well enough for the training of the mind, it has not yet been found possible to provide under modern conditions a suitable moral training for the school and college. The attempt to make boys moral and religious by the teaching of moral and religious text-books is a vanity and a delusion, precisely because the heart is not the mind and to instruct the mind does not necessarily improve the heart. It would be an error to say that it has no effect. It throws certain seeds of thought into the antahkarana and, if these thoughts become habitual, they influence the conduct. But the danger of moral text-books is that they make the thinking of high things mechanical and artificial, and whatever is mechanical and artificial, is inoperative for good.

There are three things which are of the utmost importance in dealing with a man's moral nature, the emotions, the sanskaras or formed habits and associations, and the swabhava or nature. The only way for him to train himself morally is to habituate himself to the right emotions, the noblest associations, the best mental, emotional and physical habits and the following out in right action of the fundamental impulses of his essential nature. You can impose a certain discipline on children, dress them into a certain mould, lash them into a desired path, but unless you can get their hearts and natures on your side, the conformity to this discipline becomes a hypocritical and heartless, often a cowardly compliance. This is what is done in Europe, and it leads to that remarkable phenomenon known as the sowing of wild oats as soon as the yoke of discipline at school and at home is removed, and to the social hypocrisy which is so large a feature of European life. Only what the man admires and accepts, becomes part of himself; the rest is a mask. He conforms to the discipline of society as he conformed to the moral routine of home and school, but considers himself at liberty to guide his real life, inner and private, according to his own likings and passions. On the other hand, to neglect moral and religious education altogether is to corrupt the race. The notorious moral corruption in our young men previous to the saving touch of the Swadeshi movement, was the direct result of the purely mental instruction given to them under the English system of education. The adoption of the English system under an Indian disguise in institutions like the Central Hindu College is likely to lead to the European result. That it is better than nothing, is all that can be said for it.

USE CHATARJI RAZOR AND SURGICAL INSTRUMENTS THE BEST & RELIABLE IN THE MARKET.

As in the education of the mind, so in the education of the heart, the best way is to put the child into the right road to his own perfection and encourage him to follow it, watching, suggesting, helping, but not interfering. The one excellent element in the English boarding school is that the master at his best stands there as a moral guide and example leaving the boys largely to influence and help each other in following the path silently shown to them. But the method practised is crude and marred by the excess of outer discipline, for which the pupils have no respect except that of fear, and the exigency of the inner assistance. The little good that is done is outweighed by much evil. The old Indian system of the guru commanding by his knowledge and sanctity the implicit obedience, perfect admiration, reverent emulation of the student, was a far superior method of moral discipline. It is impossible to restore that ancient system; but it is not impossible to substitute the wise friend, guide and helper for the hired instructor or the benevolent policeman which is all that the European system usually makes of the pedagogue.

The first rule of moral training is to suggest and invite, not command or impose. The best method of suggestion is by personal example, daily converse and the books read from day to day. These books should contain, for the younger student, the lofty examples of the past given, not as moral lessons, but as things of supreme human interest, and, for the elder student, the great thoughts of great souls, the passages of literature which set fire to the highest emotions and prompt the highest ideals and aspirations, the records of history and biography which exemplify the living of those great thoughts, noble emotions and aspiring ideals. This is a kind of good company, satsanga, which can seldom fail to have effect, so long as sententious sermonising is avoided, and becomes of the highest effect if the personal life of the teacher is itself moulded by the great things he places before his pupils. It cannot, however, have full force unless the young life is given an opportunity, within its limited sphere, of embodying in action the moral impulses which rise within it. The thirst of knowledge, the self-devotion, the purity, the renunciation of the Brahmin,—the courage, ardour, honour, nobility, chivalry, patriotism of the Kshatriya,—the beneficence, skill, industry, generous enterprise, and large openhandedness of the Vaisya,—the self-effacement and loving service of the Sudra,—these are the qualities of the Aryan. They constitute the moral temper we desire in our young men, in the whole nation. But how can we get them if we do not give opportunities to the young to train themselves in the Aryan tradition, to form by the practice and familiarity of childhood and boyhood the stuff of which their adult lives must be made?

Every boy should, therefore, be given practical opportunity as well as intellectual encouragement to develop all that is best in his nature. If he has bad qualities, bad habits, bad sanskaras whether of mind or body, he should not be treated harshly as a delinquent, but encouraged to get rid of them by the Rajayogic method of sanyama, rejection and substitution. He should be encouraged to think of them, not as sins or offences, but as symptoms of a curable disease alterable by a steady and sustained effort of the will,—falsehood being rejected whenever it rises into the mind and replaced by truth, fear by courage, selfishness by sacrifice and renunciation, malice by love. Great care will have to be taken that unformed virtues are not rejected as faults. The wildness and recklessness of many young natures are only the overflowings of an excessive strength, greatness and nobility. They should be purified, not discouraged.

I have spoken of morality; it is necessary to speak a word of religious teaching. There is a strange idea prevalent that by merely teaching the dogmas of religion children can be made pious and moral. This is an European error, and its practice leads either to mechanical acceptance of a creed having no effect on the inner and little on the outer life, or it creates the fanatic, the pietist, the ritualist or the unctuous hypocrite. Religion has to be lived, not learned as a creed. The singular compromise made in the so-called National Education of Bengal, making the teaching of religious beliefs compulsory, but forbidding the practice of anusthana or religious exercises, is a sample of the ignorant confusion which distracts men's minds on this subject. The prohibition is a sop to secularism declared or concealed. No religious teaching is of any value unless it is lived, and the use of various kinds of sadhana, spiritual self-training and exercise, is the only effective preparation for religious living. The ritual of prayer, homage, ceremony is craved for by many minds as an essential preparation and, if not made an end in itself, is a great help to spiritual progress; if it is withheld, some other form of meditation, devotion or religious duty must be put in its place. Otherwise, religious teaching is of little use and would almost be better ungiven.

But whether distinct teaching in any form of religion is imparted or not, the essence of religion, to live for God, for humanity, for country, for others and for oneself in these, must be made the ideal in every school which calls itself national. It is this spirit of Hinduism pervading our schools which, far more than the teaching of Indian subjects, the use of Indian methods or formal instruction in Hindu beliefs and Hindu Scriptures, should be the essence of Nationalism in our schools distinguishing them from all others.

THE STRESS OF THE HIDDEN SPIRIT.

The world is a great game of hide and seek in which the real hides behind the apparent, spirit behind matter. The apparent masquerades as real, the real is seen dimly as if it were an unsubstantial shadow. The grandeur of the visible universe and its laws enslaves men's imaginations. "This is a mighty machine" we cry, "but it moves of its own force and needs neither guide nor maker; for its motion is eternal." Blinded by a half truth we fail to see that, instead of a machine without a maker, there is really only an existence and no machine. The Hindus have many images by which they seek to convey their knowledge of the relation between God and the world, but the idea of the machine does not figure largely among them. It is a spider and his web, a fire with many sparks, a pool of salt water in which every particle is penetrated by the salt. The world is a waking dream, an embodied vision, a mass of knowledge arranged in corporeal appearances expressing so many ideas which are each only a part of one unchanging truth. Everything becomes, nothing is made. Everything is put out from latency, nothing is brought into existence. Only that which was, can be, not that which was not. And that which is, cannot perish; it can only lose itself. All is eternal in the eternal spirit.

What was from of old? The spirit. What is alone? The spirit. What shall be for ever? The spirit. All that is in Space and Time, is He; and whatever there may be beyond Space and Time, that too is He. Why should we think so? Because of the eternal and invariable unity which gives permanence to the variability of the many. The sum of matter never changes by increase or diminution, although its component parts are continually shifting; so is it with the sum of energy in the world, so is it with the spirit. Matter is only so much mobile energy vibrating intensely into form. Energy is only so much spirit manifesting the motion that we call energy. Spirit is Force, Spirit Existence,—matter and energy are only motions in Spirit. Force and Existence made one in Bliss, Sacchidanandan, this is the eternal reality of things. But that Force is not motion, it is Knowledge or Idea. Knowledge is the source of motion, not motion of knowledge. The Spirit therefore, is all, It is alone. Idea or Force, Existence, Bliss are only its triune manifestations, existence implying idea which is force, force or idea implying bliss.

The Spirit manifest as Intelligence is the basis of the world. Spirit as existence, Sat, is one; as Intelligence it multiplies itself without ceasing to be one. We see that tree and say "Here is a material thing"; but if we ask how the tree came into existence, we have to say, it grew or evolved out of the seed. But growth or evolution is only a term describing the sequence in a process. It does not explain the origin or account for the process itself. Why should the seed produce a tree and not some other form of existence? The answer is, because that is its nature. But why is that its nature? Why should it not be its nature to produce some other form of existence, or some other kind of tree. That is the law, is the answer. But why is it the Law? The only answer is that it is so because it is so; that it happens, why no man can say. In reality when we speak of Law, we speak of an idea; when we speak of the nature of a thing, we speak of an idea. Nowhere can we lay our hands on an object, a visible force, a discernable momentum and say "Here is an entity called Law or Nature." The seed evolves a tree because tree is the idea involved in the seed; it is a process of manifestation in form, not a creation. If there were no insistent idea, we should have a world of chances and freaks, not a world of law—there would be no such idea as the nature of things, if there were not an originating and ordering intelligence manifesting a particular idea in forms. And the form varies, is born, perishes; the idea is eternal. The form is the manifestation or appearance, the idea is the truth. The form is phenomenon, the idea is reality.

Therefore in all things the Hindu thinker sees the stress of the hidden spirit. We see it as Prajna the universal Intelligence, conscious in things unconscious, active in things inert. The energy of Prajna is what the Europeans call Nature. The tree does not and cannot shape itself, the stress of the hidden Intelligence shapes it. He is in the seed of man and in that little particle of matter carries habit, character, types of emotion into the unborn child. Therefore heredity is true; but if Prajna were not concealed in the seed, heredity would be false, inexplicable, impossible. We see the same stress in the mind, heart, body of man. Because the hidden spirit urges himself on the body, stamps himself on it, expresses himself in it, the body expresses the individuality of the man, the developing and conscious idea of varying type which is myself; therefore no two faces, no two expressions, no two stamp impressions even are entirely alike; every part of the body in some way or other expresses the man. The stress of the spirit shows itself in the mind and heart; therefore men, families, nations, have individuality, run into particular habits of thought and feeling, therefore also they are both alike and dissimilar. Therefore men act and react, not only physically but spiritually, intellectually, morally on each other, because there is one self in all creatures expressing itself in various idea and forms variously suitable to the idea. The stress of the hidden Spirit expresses itself again in events and the majestic course of the world. This is the zeit Geist, this is the purpose that runs through the process of the centuries, the changes of the suns, this is that which makes evolution possible and provides it with a way, means and a goal "This is He who from years sempiternal hath ordered perfectly all things"

This is the teaching of the Vedanta as we have it in its oldest form in the Upanishads. Advaita, Vishishtadvaita, Dvaita are merely various ways of looking at the relations of the One to the Many, and none of them have the right to monopolise the name Vedanta. Advaita is true, because the Many are only manifestations of the one. Vishishtadvaita is true because ideas are eternal and having manifested, must have manifested before and will manifest again,—the many are eternal in the One, only they are sometimes manifest and sometimes unmanifest. Dvaita is true, because although from one point of view the One and the Many are eternally and essentially the same, yet, from another, the idea in its manifestation is eternally different from the Intelligence in which it manifests. If Unity is eternal and unchangable, duality is persistently recurrent. The Spirit is infinite, illimitable, eternal and infinite, illimitable, eternal is its stress towards manifestation filling endless space with innumerable existences.

This that is manifested and secret, this that moveth in the heart our being, the mighty foundation on whom all that moves and breathes and sees is established, you shall know to be that Supreme and Adorable which is the Is and the Is Not and is beyond knowledge and the highest to its creatures.

2. This brilliant, this subtler than subtlety, this vastness in which all the worlds are set with their peoples, this is that which is Brahman Immutable. Life is That, Speech is That, Mind is That, That is the truth, That Immortality. O fair son, know It for that into which thou must penetrate.

3. Take up the bow of the Upanishad, that mighty weapon, set to it an arrow sharpened by worship; draw the bow with a mind steeped in the feeling of oneness and shoot at the Eternal as thou wouldst shoot at a target.

4. OM is the bow and the soul is the arrow and God is the target. Pierce Him with an infaltering aim and lose thyself in Him as an arrow is lost in that it striketh.

5. He in whom the mind is set with all the life-currents and in whom heaven and earth and the ether are inwoven; Him know to be the one self of all; all other creed renounces: for this is the bridge over death and the way to immortality

6. Where the nerves meet in the heart of a man as the spokes of a wheel meet in the nave of it, there God dwelleth within us and is born in many disguises. Meditate on the Self as Om and let this ferry you to the other side of the great darkness.

7. The Omniscient and All comprehending of whom is all this might and majesty, that the earth declareth, He the self is enthroned in His heaven in the holy city of the Spirit. As spirit become mind He is the pilot of the life and the body; He hath set the heart as His foundation and by that heart He is established in matter. Him by the high and direct knowledge strong and quiet souls behold all a lustre and delight and immortality.

8. When a man hath seen that Higher and Lower, the knot of his heart-strings is rent, then all his doubts are cut asunder and his works dwindle away from him.

9. The Brahman in a glorious golden sheath is hid, the indivisible and stainless Spirit who is free from action and passion; He is the brightness and the lustre of lustres and the One that self-knowers know.

10. There the sun does not shine and the Moon has no splendour, the stars are blind; there these lightnings flash not nor any earthly fire. For all that is bright is but the shadow of His brightness, and by His shining all this shineth.

11. For this is the Brahman and the Immortal. The Brahman is before us and the Brahman is behind us, the Brahman is to the south of us and the Brahman is to the north of us, the Brahman is above us and the Brahman is below us. He is extended everywhere. This whole magnificent universe is nothing but the Brahman.

CHAPTER I.

1. There are two birds that cling to one common tree, beautiful of plumage, yokefellows are they, eternal companions; and one of them eateth the delicious fruit of the tree and the other eateth not, but watcheth his fellow.

2. Man is the bird that dwelleth on one common tree with God, but he is lost in its sweetness, and because he is the slave of its sweetness and fallen from lordship, therefore he hath grief, therefore he is bewildered. But when he seeth that other who is Lord and the beloved, then he knoweth that all this is but His greatness, and his grief passeth away from him.

3. When the wise man, the seer beholdeth the Golden-hued, the Doer of all actions, the Lord, the Purusha, the womb of Brahman, then he shaketh from him sin and righteousness and he conquereth all stain and riseth to a high Equality towards all things and all creatures.

4. For the wise man, because he knoweth Him for the Life that becometh apparent through all creatures, taketh not pleasure in creeds nor in much disputing. He, that doing all actions, yet playeth with the Self and rejoiceth in the Self, such a man is the best of God knowers.

5. For the Self is always to be won; He is won by truth and self-discipline, and He is won by perfect knowledge, and He is won by holy living, even that bright and luminous Purusha in the inner body whom with the vaning of human defect men striving after God behold.

6. Truth prevaileth at last and not falsehood. Truth built the long high-road of the Gods by which the Rishis satisfying their desire, journey where that highest home of Truth hath His dwelling.

7. He is godlike, immense, unimaginable; and again He appeareth as finer than the fine: He who is farther than farness, is yet very near. He is here, He is hidden in the heart of us when we have eyes to see Him.

8. Eye cannot seize, and speech cannot grasp Him, nor all the other gods understand, nor can self-discipline reach Him, nor the most strenuous deeds; only whose higher intelligence is purified by the clearness of knowledge, beholdeth after long meditation God indivisible.

9. The Self is subtle and can be known with the heart only, and in the heart life gathereth its fivefold currents. All the heart of creatures is with the vital currents shot through and interwoven, and only when that is purified, the Self in its manifest purity pervadeth it.

10. Whatsoever world the pure-hearted illumineth with his thoughts or whatsoever objects of enjoyment he desireth, he taketh that world by conquest and winneth those desires; let him then that wisheth for lordship, approach with homage the self-knower.

CHAPTER. II.

1. For he knoweth the Brahman, that highest abiding-place, in whom all this brilliant universe abideth. The strong and quiet souls that worship without desire the Purusha, rise beyond this seed and this procreation.

2. He who desireth and his mind dwelleth with yearnings, by those yearnings is born again in this place or in that other; but when a man hath satisfied himself of desire and realised his Self, for him even in this world all desires dissolve and vanish.

3. The Self is not to be won by exposition, nor by brainpower, nor by much learning; but He whom the Spirit chooseth, he getteth the Spirit and to Him this Self of all discovereth His body.

4. The Self is not to be won by the weak nor by a confused heart nor by featureless self-discipline; but the man of knowledge who by these means striveth after God, to him this Self entereth into the Brahman as its dwelling-place.

5. Calm souls, winning God, having their thirst of knowledge satiated, possessed of the Self, free from affections, passionless, win utterly the Omnipresent and enter into the

All by harmony with the Self of all creatures.

6. They who have made sure of the real nature of things by the knowledge that is the end of the Veda, purified in their higher intelligence by divine renunciation, are made in the ultimate end of things absolute and immortal and are released in the heavens of the Brahman.

7. The sixteen members depart into their foundations and all the gods to their containing Gods return, and actions depart and the Self that is made of pure knowledge; all are made one in the Highest who is imperishable.

8. As rivers flowing onwards set at last in the sea and forget their separate name and form, so the knower delivered from name and form returns to that divine Purusha who is higher than the Highest.

9. For he that knoweth this Highest Brahman, becometh Brahman, nor of his house is any born that knoweth not the Eternal; he crosseth over sin, he crosseth over grief, he becometh immortal; for he is released from the captivity of the heart-strings.

10. This is the thing said in the Rigveda; "The Vedawise who perform due actions and are devoted to the Brahman and themselves offer all with faith to the one Master of Knowledge, to them one shall tell this God-knowledge, who have performed and done with the vow of the head according to the ritual."

BAJI PURBHOU.

Small respite had the slender band who held
 Fate constant with that brittle hoop of steel;
 For like the crest of an arriving wave,
 The Moslem van appeared, though slow and tired,
 Yet too late to break such barrier faint,
 And forced themselves to run;—nor long availed;
 For with a single cry the muskets spoke,
 Once and again and always, as they neared,
 And, like a wave arrested, for a while
 The assailants paused and like a wave collapsed,
 Spent backward in a cloud of broken spray,
 Retreating. Yielded up the dangerous gorgo
 Saw only on the gnarled and stumbling rise
 The dead and wounded heaped. But from the rear
 The main tremendous onset of the North
 Came in a dark and undulating surge
 Regardless of the check,—a mingled mass,
 Pathan and Mogul and the Rajput clans,
 All clamorous with the brazen throats of war
 And spitting smoke and fire. The bullets rang
 Upon the rocks, but in their place unhurt,
 Sheltered by tree and rock the silent grim
 Defenders waited, till on root and stone
 The confident, high-voiced, triumphant surge
 Began to break, to stumble, then to pause,
 Confusion in its narrowed front. At once
 The muskets clamoured out, the bullets sped,
 Deadly though few; again and yet again,
 And some of the impetuous faltered back
 And some in wrath pressed on; and while they swayed

 Poised between flight and onset, blast on blast
 The volleyed death invisible hailed in Upon uncertain ranks. The leaders fell,
 The forward by the bullets chosen out,
 Prone or supine or leaning like sick men
 O'er trees and rocks, distressed the whole advance
 With prohibition by the silent slain.

So that great onset failed. And now withdrawn
 The generals consulted, and at last
 In marching, ordered ranks the footmen came,
 An iron resolution in their tread,
 Silent, deliberate. Far in the van,
 Tall and large-limbed, a formidable array,
 The Pathan infantry; a chosen force,
 Lower in crest, strong-framed, the Rajputs marched,

 The chivalry of Agra led the rear,
 Then Baji first broke silence, "Lo, the surge!
 That was but spray of death we first repelled,
 Chosen of Shiyaji, Bhavani's awards,
 For you the gods prepare. We die indeed,
 But let us die with the highvoiced assent
 Of Heaven to our country's claim enforced
 To freedom." As he spoke, the Mogul lines
 Entered the menacing wide-throated gorge,
 Carefully walking, but not long that care
 Endured, for where they entered, there they fell,
 Others behind in silence stern advanced.
 They came, they died; still on the previous dead
 New dead fell thickening. Yet by paces slow
 The lines advanced with labour infinite

And merciless expense of valiant men.

For even as the slopes were killed and held,
 Still the velocity and lethal range
 Increased of the Maharatta bullets; dead
 Rather than living held the conquered slope,—
 The living who, half-broken, paused. Abridged,
 Yet wide, the interval opposed advance,
 Daunting those resolute natures; eyes once bold
 With gloomy hesitation reckoned up
 The dread equivalent in human lives
 Of cubits and of yards, and hardly hoped
 One could survive the endless unacquired
 Country between. But from the southron wall
 The muskets did not hesitate, but urged Refusal stern; the bullets did not pause,
 Nor calculate expense. Active they thronged Humming like bees and stung strong lives to death.

Making a holiday of carnage. Then
 The heads that planned pushed swiftly to the front

 The centre yet unhurt, where Rajasthan,
 Playmate of death, had sent her hero sons.
 They with a rapid royal reckless pace
 Came striding to the intervening ground,
 Nor answered uselessly the bullets thick
 Nor paused to judge, but o'er the increasing dead
 Leaping and striding, shouting, sword in hand,
 Rushed onward with immortal courage high
 In mortal forms, and held the lower slope,
 But now the higher incline, short but steep,
 Baffled their speed, and as they clambered up,
 Compact and fiery, like the rapid breath
 Of Agra's hot simoom, the sheeted flame
 Belched bullets. Down they fell with huge collapse,
 And, rolling, with their shock drove back the few
 Who still attempted. Barred advance, retreat.
 Threatening disgrace and slaughter, for a while
 Like a bound sacrifice the Rajputs stood Diminishing each moment. Then a lord
 High-crested of the Rathore clan stood out
 From the perplexed assailants with his sword
 Beckoning the thousands on against the few,
 And him the bullets could not touch; he stood Defended for moment by his lance
 Not yet exhausted. And a mighty shout
 Rose from behind, and in a violent flood
 The Rajputs flung themselves on the incline
 Like clambering lions. Many hands received
 The dead as they descended, flinging back
 Those mournful obstacles, and with a rush
 The lead surmounted and on level ground
 Stood sword in hand; yet only for a while,—
 For grim and straight the slogan of the south
 Leaped with the fifty swords to thrust them back, Baji the Purbhou leading. Thrice they came,
 Three times prevailed, three times the Southron charge

 Repelled them; till at last the Rathore lord,
 As one appointed, led the advancing death,
 Nor waited to assure his desperate holds
 But hurled himself on Baji; those behind Bore forward those in front. From right and left Maharatta muskets rang their massing out
 And withered the attack, that still dissolved,
 Still formed again from the insistent rear

And would not end. So was the fatal gorge Filled with the clamour of the close-fought fight.
 Sword ring on sword, the slogan shout, the cry
 Of guns, the hiss of bullets filled the air,
 And murderous strife heaped up the scanty space,
 Rajput and strong Mahratta breathing hard
 In desperate battle. But far off the hosts
 Of Agra stood arrested, confident,
 Waiting the end. Far otherwise it came
 Than they expected. For, as in the front,
 The Rathore stood on the disputed verge
 And ever threw fresh strength into the scale
 With that inspiring gesture, Baji came Towards him singling out the lofty crest,
 The princely form; and, as the waves divide,
 Before a driving keel, the battle so
 Before him parted, till he neared, he slew.
 Avoiding sword, avoiding lifted arm
 The blade surprised the Rajput's throat, and down
 As falls an upright poplar, with his hands
 Outspread, dying, he clutched Mahratta ground.
 Loud rose the slogan as he fell. Amazed,
 The eager hosts of Agra saw reel back
 The Rajput battle, desperate victory
 Turned suddenly into entire defeat,
 Not headlong, but with strong discouragement,
 Sullen, convinced, rejecting the emprise.
 As they retired, the brilliant Pathan van Assumed the attempt. "Exhaust," the "Exhaust the stubborn mountaineers; for now,
 Fatigued with difficult effort and success,
 They hardly stand, weary, unstrung, inert.
 Shatter this fringe, and we march on and seize Baigurb and Shivaji." Meanwhile, they too

 Not idle, covered by the rocks and trees
 Straining for vantage, pausing on each ledge
 Seizing each bush, each jutting promontory,
 Some iron muscles, climbing, of the south
 Lurked on the gorge's gloomy walls unseen.
 On came the Pathans running rapidly.
 But as the nearest left the rocky curve
 Where lurked the ambush, loud from stone and tree
 The silence spoke. Sideways, in front, behind Death clamoured; and tall figures strewed
 the ground
 Like trees in a cyclone. Appalled the rest Broke this way and broke that, and some cried, "On!
 Some shouted "Back!" for those who led, fell fast.
 So the advance dissolved, divided,—more
 In haste towards the plains, greeted with death
 Even while they ran; but others forward, full
 Of panic courage, drove towards the foe
 They could not reach,—so hot a blast and fell Stayed their unsteady valour, their retreat
 So swift and obstinate a question galled, Few through the hail survived. With gloom their chiefs
 Beheld the rout and drawing back their hosts
 In dubious council met, whether to leave
 That gorge of slaughter unredeemed or yet
 Demand the price of so immense a loss.

HATHA YOGA.

Hatha Yoga is that branch of science of Yoga which teaches how to conquer hunger, thirst and sleep; how to overcome effects of heat and cold; how to gain perfect health and cure disease without using drugs; how to arrest the untimely decay of the body resulting from the waste of vital energy; how to preserve youth even at the age of one hundred without having a single hair turn grey, and how to prolong life in this body for an indefinite period. Anyone who practices it with in the course of time acquire marvellous powers; powers indeed which must dumbfound a psychologist or anatomist.

A few years ago a Hatha Yogi was brought to England. Although in middle life he looked like a boy of eighteen. Not only was his physical condition perfect but through practice he had mastered eighty-four postures of the body. He could bend his limbs in so astonishing a way that it seemed as if his joints must be unattached while his bones were as though made of some elastic substance. Many English physicians and surgeons came to see him and were amazed at the extraordinary positions of his limbs. They brought a skeleton and tried to fix its bones in the same positions, but could not do so without breaking them. Afterwards they reached the conclusion that if the bones were once fixed in those positions the man would be unfitted for any kind of work. Yet the example of the Yogi openly contradicted their statements. His limbs were strong and of good use to him in every possible way. He could work, lift heavy weights, and move about with absolute ease. The writer himself saw him in India, and also other Hatha Yogis who could accomplish equally wonderful feats. The primary object of these various postures described in Hatha Yoga is to gain control over the involuntary muscles of the body which is impossible to the ordinary man. We all possess this power latent within us, but the Hatha Yogis were the first to discover a scientific method by which it could be developed.

All Hatha Yogis eat very little, but they can go also entirely without food for days or even for months, and succeed in conquering sleep. The author knew of one who had not slept for twelve years, and who was nevertheless in perfect health. He has also seen a Hatha Yogi usually ate, for instance, a piece of unseasoned bread in twenty-four hours, and who refused to wear warm clothing in the coldest winter weather, and yet who voluntarily worked hard as a street labourer without showing the least sign of fatigue. It was impossible to the majority of people who have made themselves much slaves to sleep and food as to imagine that if they do not sleep eight or nine hours of the twenty-four and eat pounds of flesh, they cannot live. Hatha Yogis are the living contradictions of such opinions. Perhaps the reader is familiar with the account of that Yogi who was buried alive for forty days in an hermetically sealed box, with a guard of English officers to watch the the sept night and day. During these forty days, the Yogi could neither eat, sleep, nor breathe yet at their expiration he was brought to consciousness without any ill effects and he lived for many years.

Then again these same Yogis who do not eat, sleep, or drink for a long period, can, if they wish, eat as much as ten persons at one time without suffering any unpleasant consequences. Of course they do not eat any kind of meat. They digest their food consciously, as it were. They claim that by a third eye they can, so to speak, see what is going on in their internal organs. Why should this seem incredible to us when the discovery of Roentgen rays transparent?

Some of the Hatha Yogis have extraordinary eyesight. They can not only perceive objects at a great distance, but can also see clearly in complete darkness. When lying down, they can pick up pins from the floor without the least glimmer of ordinary light to guide them. This will not appear so strange when we remember that there is invisible light in the atmosphere of a perfectly dark room. If we can learn to use this atmospheric light, imperceptible to the common eye, and can develop our eyesight, there is no reason why we should not see things in the dark. The Yogis understand this and know the method by which the power of eye sight can be developed. As regards distinguishing objects at a great distance this is not so difficult to believe since we know that here are persons living not Yogis, who can see the moons of Jupiter without the help of any instrument.

This branch of optical science in Hatha Yoga is called in Sanskrit "Trataka" Yoga. It teaches, among other things, how, through gazing on one object and at the same time performing certain special breathing exercises, many optical maladies can be cured as well as the power of sight strengthened. The authentic records of Hatha Yogis much for the fact that it produces many beneficial effects when properly practised under the direction of a competent master of Hatha Yoga.

A Yogi who is expert in this science of optics can fascinate or madden another by his optical powers. The process of hypnotism or mesmerism verifies this claim. A Yogi can likewise read the thoughts of another by looking at his eyes; for according to the Yogi the eye is the index of the Mind. Here it may be asked how do the Yogis acquire these powers? They do not get them from outside. These powers are dormant in every individual, and through practice the Yogis bring them out. They say:—"Whatever exists in the universe (the macrocosm) exists also in the human body (the microcosm.)" "That is, the finer forces exist potentially in our own organism, and if we study our nature carefully we shall be able to know all the forces and the laws which govern the universe.

Hatha Yoga, again, teaches the cure of disease through breathing exercises and the regulation of the diet and of the general habits of the daily life. But it does not claim that physical health is the same as spirituality. On the contrary, it tells us that if a healthy body were a sign of spiritualities, then wild animals and savages who enjoy perfect health would be exceedingly spiritual; yet they are not, as we know. The principal idea of these Yogis is that physical maladies are obstacles in the path of spiritual progress, while a healthy body furnishes one of the most favourable conditions for the realisation of the highest spiritual truths in this life. Those who do not possess good health should, therefore, begin to practice Hatha Yoga.

In the practice of Hatha Yoga strict dietetic rules must be observed. Anything that is sharp, sour, pungent, or hot, like mustard, liquors, flesh of animals, curd, buttermilk, oil cakes, carrots, onions, and garlic should not be eaten. Food, again, which having been once cooked, has grown cold and been rewarmed, should be avoided; as should also excess of salt or acidity or that which is hard to digest. Rice, barley, wheat, milk, sugar, honey and butter are good for a Hatha Yoga diet. The manner in which Americans live in hotels and boarding-houses, where the food is often unclean, is far from favourable to this practice. Food cooked for hundreds of people in a restaurant cannot be equally good for all and may easily cause disease. Those who wish to enjoy perfect health must be careful about what they eat; they must also observe all the laws of hygiene regarding cleanliness of the body, fresh air, and pure water. They should not live in over-heated houses; neither should they indulge in artificial stimulants specially beer, wine and coffee the habit of excessive coffee-drinking is a serious menace to American nation. Many people are already suffering from nervous prostration as a result of indulgence in this direction, and there are very few cases in which the nervous system will not be affected by it to some extent.

He who wishes to practice Hatha Yoga should first of all find a Hatha Yoga teacher, who has perfect control over his physical body; and having found him, he should lead a life in strict accord with his instructions. He should lead a life in a secluded spot and where the changes of weather are neither sudden nor extreme. He should be a rigid vegetarian and abstain from all kinds of drinks that stimulate the system. He should never fill the stomach with a large quantity of food. He should observe the moral laws and practice absolute continence. He should learn to control his senses, keep his body clean, and purify his mind by arousing feelings of kindness and love towards all living creatures. (Extract from Swami Abhedananda's "How to be a Yogi")

INDIAN ARCHITECTURAL ART: A MOST STRIKING CONTRAST BETWEEN INDIA AND EUROPE.

I. Views of Mr. James Fergusson D. C. L., F. R. S.

Mr. James Fergusson, D. C. L., F. R. S., M. R. A. S., the great authority on the subject of Architecture, in his monumental work, the "History of Indian and Eastern Architecture" (forming the third Volume of the New Edition of History of Architecture, a work in four volumes), draws a most striking contrast between India and Europe, in respect of the claims of Indian and European Architectural Art. Says that distinguished authority,—"Those who have an opportunity of seeing what perfect buildings the ignorant, uneducated natives of India are now producing, will easily understand how success may be achieved; while those who observe what failures the best educated and most talented architects in Europe are constantly perpetrating may, by a study of Indian models, easily see why this must inevitably be the result. It is only in India that the two systems can now be seen practised side by side,—the educated intellectual European always failing because his principles are wrong, the feeble and uneducated native as inevitable succeeding, because his principles are right. The Indian builders think only of what they are doing, and how they can best produce the effect they desire. In the European system it is considered more essential that a building, especially in its details should be a correct copy of something else, than good in itself or appropriate to its purpose;

hence the difference in the result. The mode in which the art has been practised in Europe for the last three centuries has been very confusing. In India, is clear and intelligible. No one can look at the subject without seeing its importance, and no one can study the art as practised there without recognising what the principles of the science really are. Architecture in India is still a living art, practised on the principles which caused its wonderful development in Europe in the 12th and 13th centuries; and there consequently, and there alone, the student of architecture has a chance of seeing the real principles of the art in action. * * What really renders India so interesting as an object of study is that it is now a living entity. Greece and Rome are dead and have passed away and we are living so completely in the midst of modern Europe that we cannot get outside to contemplate it as a whole. But India is complete cosmos in itself." (History of Indian Architecture, pp. 5, 6, and 4).

II. Views of Mr. E. B. Havell.

Mr. E. B. Havell, ex-Principal of the Government School of Arts, at Madras and at Calcutta, and the author of that monumental work, INDIAN SCULPTURE AND PAINTING, is no less emphatic than Mr. James Fergusson on the capacity for constructive achievement of the Indian builders. In an article in the Hindustan Review for April, 1909, he expresses himself in a manner which leaves no room for doubt.

"James Fergusson wrote of the Indian builders, 30 or 40 years ago, that he had imbibed from them more of the true principles of architecture, as practised by the greater master-builders of Europe than he had learnt from all the books he had read. And I myself in recent years have watched and admired their skill, and found evidence, which would convince any but a "sun-dried bureaucrat" that India could still rival her great architectural triumphs in the past, if the cruel and senseless official boycott which our administrative system imposes upon her master-builders were removed. For, let it be understood that under our stupid University and and Public works Systems, the Indian master-builder finds all approaches to lucrative employment barred to him, throughout British India and in many of the Native States, unless he abandons all the traditions of Indian craftsmanship and becomes a mechanical copyist of the regulation European, departmental designs.

"By the official boycott of the Indian master-builder, we also boycott not only all the higher handicrafts for which India has always been one of the greatest schools in the world—wood and stone carving and inlaying, metal-work, lacquer-work, terra-cotta and tile-work—but the fine arts as well. It is chiefly through this official neglect of Indian architecture and contempt for Indian art that the Indian aristocracy now fill their palaces with tenth-rate European pictures, instead of employing the Indian artists, descended from the court-painters of Akbar, Jahangir and Shah Jahan, to decorate their chitra-salas or picture-halls, with splendid fresco-paintings, as they did in the days of the great Mogul. For where do the Indian master-builders who uphold the splendid tradition of Agra and Delhi find employment and encouragement? Not in British India, where we have made architecture practically a Government monopoly; but in the few "unprogressive," Native States which still value their past artistic traditions. * * The war of commercialism which in the last two centuries has swept over Europe, carrying away all but a few feeble remnants of the splendid traditional craftsmanship of the Middle Ages, has not yet entirely overwhelmed Indian Art. Art in India, especially in the North, is much more real and living, less artificial and exotic, than it is in the great art-centres of Europe. India needs art-schools, museums, picture and sculpture galleries. The descendants of the architects who built the Taj-Mahal; of the Court-painters who executed the exquisite miniatures which are the delight of the modern connoisseurs; of the craftsmen who decorated the places of Jahangir and Shah Jahan; and of the engineers who constructed their great public works, still carry on the traditions of their forefathers. And throughout the villages of India, there are still handicraftsmen—weavers, cotton-painters, potters, goldsmiths, brass-smiths, wood and stone-carvers, etc., whose skill of hand and inherited craft traditions represent a natural source of immense industrial wealth, which in Europe, is revived artificially by an elaborate and costly system of teaching in art-schools, by museums, art-galleries and schools of handicraft."

THE FUTURE OF INDIA.

These passages are quoted from one of the Madras lectures of Swami Vivekananda.

"This is the ancient land where wisdom made its home before it went into any other country, the same India whose influx of spirituality is represented on the material plane by rolling rivers like oceans, where the eternal Himalayas, rising tier after tier, with their snowcaps, as it were, looking into the very mysteries of heaven. Here is the same India whose soil has been trodden by the feet of the greatest sages that ever lived. Here first arose enquiries into the nature of man, and into the internal world. Here first arose the doctrines of the immortality of the soul, existence of a supervising God, an immanent God in nature and in man, and here the highest ideals of religion and philosophy have attained their culminating points. This is the land from whence, like tidal waves, spirituality and philosophy have again and again marched out and deluged the world, and this is the land from whence more such tides must proceed in order to bring life and vigour into the decaying races of mankind. It is the same India which has withstood the shocks of centuries, of hundreds of foreign invasions, of hundreds of upheavals of manners and customs. It is the same land which stands firmer than any rock in the world with its undying vigour, and indistructible life. He is of the same nature as the teaching about soul, without beginning and without end, immortal and we are the children of such a country.

INCENTIVE FROM THE PAST

I am here to speak to you to-day, about some practical things and my object in reminding you about the glories of the past is simply this. Many times have I been told that looking into the past only degenerates and leads to nothing, let us look into the future. Look back, therefore, as far as you can, drink deep of the eternal fountains that are behind, and after that, look forward, march forward, and make India brighter, greater, much higher, than she ever was. Our ancestors were great, we must first know that. We must learn the element of our being, the blood that courses in our veins, we must have faith in that blood, and what it did in the past, and out of that faith and consciousness of that greatness, we must build an India, yet greater than what she has been. There have been periods of decay and degradation. I do not attach much importance to that, we all know that; that period has been necessary. The mighty tree produces beautiful ripe fruit. This fruit is put on the ground, it decays, it rots, and out of that decay spring the roots, and the future tree perhaps mightier than the first one. And this decay through which we have passed was necessary. Out of this decay is coming the India of the future; it is already sprouting, its first leaves are already out and the mighty gigantic tree, the urdhvamulam is here, already beginning to appear."

The Swami after dealing with the variety of conditions that make Indian problems very complicated and saying that religion is the only common ground in Asia and before religion all difficulties vanish, proceeded.

UNIFYING OF RELIGION THE BASIS OF THE FUTURE INDIA :—

The first plank in the making of a future India, the first step that is to be when out of that rock of ages, is this unifying of religion. We have to be taught that Hindus, Dualists, Qualified Monists, or Monists, or any other sects Saivaites, Vaishnavites, Pasupati, all the various denominations, have certain common ideas behind, that the time has come when, for the well-being of ourselves, for the well-being of our race, we must give up our differences and quarrels.

RELIGION STRENGTHENS NATIONAL LIFE.

It is when the national body is weak all sorts of diseases germinate in the political state of the race, or in social state, or in any educational, intellectual state, crowd into the system and produce disease. To remedy it, therefore, we must go to the root of this disease and cleanse the blood of all impurities. The one tendency will be to strengthen the man, to make the blood pure, the body vigorous, so that it will be able to resist and throw out all external poisons, and we have seen that our vigour, our strength, nay, our national life, is in our religion.

FOCUS ALL WILL-POWER TOWARDS ONE IDEAL.

The future of India depends entirely upon the accumulation of energy and power. This is the secret, accumulation of the will-powers, coordination, bringing them all, as it were into one focus. Each Chinaman thinks his own way, and a handful of Japanese think all in the same way and you know the result. That is how it goes throughout in the history of the world you find compact little nations always ruling huge unwieldy nations and it is natural because it is easier for the little compact nations to bring their ideas into the same focus, and they become developed. And the bigger the nation, the more unwieldy they are, born as is were a disorganised mob, they can not combine. All these quarrels must cease.

SECTION 1:—SCIENCE AND ART IN RELIGION.

The following chapter is taken from Kisori Lal Sarkar's "Hindu System of Religious Science and Art."

Roughly speaking, Rationalism is the developing of knowledge, and Emotionalism is the moving of the heart. And what are Science and Art as explained before? Science is clear knowledge and art is a practical appreciative movement. Thus generally speaking, Science corresponds to Rationalism and Art to Emotionalism. It is especially so in the case of religion, and as regards the Hindu religion, the distinction between Rationalism and Emotionalism as corresponding to Science of religion and Art of religion is brought out in relief at every step.

Rationalism and Emotionalism in ordinary parlour may simply mean reasoning and feeling processes as found in the lives of men in general. They may be simply matters of lokaika (worldly) experience as the Hindus would say. But in the Hindu mind the terms Jnana and Bhakti meaning Rationalism and Emotionalism convey a much higher import.

Jnana is not common knowledge, but it is the illumination of the soul by which the Para Brahma is realized as the great Soul of the Universe. And Bhakti is similarly not an ordinary feeling of love and attachment, but that self-less devotion which the touch of the All-Beautiful and All-Loving Supreme Spirit draws forth from the hearts of men.

Such is the Rationalism and Emotionalism of Hinduism as called. The process which leads to the above Jnana and Bhakti are respectively the process of purified Rationalism and Emotionalism.

Rationalism is sometimes associated with what is called Nibritti (renunciation) and Emotionalism with what is called Prabritti (activity).

This association for the two is considering the concomitants of the two processes as shown below.

As stated above, Rationalism as incited by the Hindus is knowledge purified. But how it is purified? It is purified by self-abnegation and abstraction. Para Brahma predominates in any degree, it vitiate thought with prejudice. Thought is also subject to vitiation when one is in a whirlpool of excitement. Therefore self-abnegation and abstraction which are all that is meant by the word renunciation are associated with Jnanakanda. In other words, it is for this reason that Jnanakanda is said to be the Nibritti, Dharma. Again Emotionalism as approved by the Hindus, is similarly desire and action purified. But how are they to be purified? Desire and action cannot be purified by rest and inactivity. They cannot be altogether suppressed successfully or with any beneficial result. They are purified only by indulging in activity in a self-sacrificing spirit. Thus a self-sacrificing spirit of activity being the only means of purifying them Emotionalism is very properly associated with what is called Prabritti Dharma or proper indulgence in action.

In reality there is no conflict between what is called Nibritti Dharma and what is called Prabritti Dharma. For Nibritti is the elimination of self-fulness and not the elimination of action.

Rationalism and Emotionalism may be compared and contrasted as follows:—The one is based upon Viveka or dispassionate analysis, the other upon Sadhana or earnest devotion.

The quantum of the one is measured by the extent, the quantum of the other is measured by depth; and thus the one tends to a consciousness of an all-prevailing expansion and the other tends to that of concentration to a point or to a focus.

The one widens the range of the view of the Divinity; the other, intensifies the touch of the Divinity.

The one imparts religious thoughts; the other substantiates religious facts. The great difference between Rationalism and Emotionalism is that, the one is of the theoretical character and the other of a practical character.

Rationalism or Science supplies bare knowledge, but Emotionalism or Art fulfils some want of the heart. Thus the path of Rationalism is abstract, while the truth of Emotionalism is home-felt.

Although Science and Art are allied together, the function of each is separate. Similarly, the function of Rationalism and Emotionalism is separate, the one gives an abstract knowledge of the Deity, and the other makes Him touched and felt in His protection and love.

Cheap Edition of KARMAYOGIN.

The difficulty felt by many students and educated men of small means in buying the KARMAYOGIN at its ordinary price of two annas, has been so much pressed on our attention that we have found it necessary to bring out a cheaper edition at one anna a copy. It is not an easy thing in this country to establish a weekly review of this standard written in English, and it has therefore been necessary for us at the outset to place a price on the paper which should ensure its being self-supporting even with a limited circulation. The KARMAYOGIN, however, is now sufficiently successful to allow of a concession of this kind being made without financial injury. The subscribers to the superior edition will be compensated by the superior get-up and paper, while the cheaper edition will remove the grievance of the large number who have hitherto been debarred from reading the review by their scanty means.

PASSING THOUGHTS.

—ooo—

Indian Regeneration.

It is common amongst men of almost all parties in India today, to use the word Regeneration, as if their country's need in this respect were so obvious as to require no arguing. It may be worth while to pause and ask, Is this really so? If so, why? and in what respects?

In the first place, India, we are to suppose, requires regeneration. Do other countries also require it? Does England, for instance, require it? or America, Germany, France? In the ordinary use of the term, we think it is assumed that India requires the purifying and unerring process of rebirth in a sense which England does not share. Is India then, in our minds inferior to England? Is she more degraded than England? These are points in which clearness of thought and vision are absolutely necessary.

Let us put the question in another way, in a way which will command our instant apprehension,—Is my mother more degraded than so-and-so's English Mother? How dare anyone suggest the question! yet the greater includes the less. Evidently no man worthy of the name could sit quiet, to hear of the degradation of his country, in comparison with that of another people. Yet India needs something, and needs it badly, or this worm-like attitude could not have been so hastily assumed.

When we compare the great era of Cobden, Bright and Gladstone, in English politics, with the era of the Boer war, the Thibetan expedition and the Labour-question in the Transvaal, it might be suggested that England also required regeneration. But the mysterious term would evidently in that case connote a purely spiritual process of self-renewal. It would be equivalent to the exclamation of a great Indian Moderate, some years ago, "Oh that the England of the Emancipation of the slave, the England of the Reform Bill, the England of the repeal of the Corn Laws, of the emancipation of the child, the labourer and woman, the England of so many emancipations, would return upon herself!"

Oh that she would, indeed! The meaning here is perfectly clear and unconfused. The same man who says this, however, is capable of saying in the very next breath, a man for man, an Englishman is a better man than an Indian." With these premises he cannot be referring to their comparative spirituality. It is not even probable that he is referring to intellectual capacity. No, his comparison is directed solely to the relative strength, aggressiveness and prowess of self-protection of the two persons, Englishman and Indian. Man for man, the advantage here lies, he feels, with the Englishman. He knows better what he wants, as an Englishman, and how to reach it, than the Indian, as an Indian. And this he may believe, though at the same time he sincerely feels his own people to be greater, in every moral, spiritual and intellectual quality.

The Invention of the Machine.

Now the sudden introduction of machinery at the end of the eighteenth century, revolutionised the western world. Thousands of men were concentrated into a single factory. They lost their individuality as craftsmen and became a mass of unskilled "labour." Their consolidated interests, however, made them a force to be reckoned with. The single factory became a city of factories. Manchester, Sheffield, Birmingham, grew up in a night by the rush of peasants from the villages to become machine-tenders. Along with their rustic culture, however, these villages threw off also their rustic allegiance to the zeminder and the clergy. They stood in the city poorer than they themselves could dream but also free for the first time of the Padre and the squire. They had to receive the franchise. Without it, they were too dangerous. The Corn Laws had to be repealed in their favour or there would have been no law left in England. The People, in fact, were born.

The Birth of the People.

But now a marvellous thing comes to light. The qualities which the English had hitherto manifested as individuals, as a ruling class, they now began to demonstrate as a nation. And perhaps the most prominent of these characteristics was a clear and definite notion of what they wanted. About this, they were all agreed—agreed to a man. This is the most remarkable feature in the English character. They know what they want and they all want it. They all act automatically and instinctively, at whatever distance from each other, on this unspoken agreement amongst themselves. There is an immense area of thought, feeling and action, throughout which every Englishman behaves exactly like every other Englishman. The thing they want is not always very high. In the reign of Elizabeth they were contented with a very modest allowance of religious freedom, and the right to explore the world and expand their trade. The point is that they all want it. And they all have a definite idea of how it is to be achieved. The enfranchised peasant is, in this respect, only one voice more added to the House of Peers. What he wanted was a vote, not the chance to do something great with this vote! Between themselves there may be something that requires adjustment to the world outside, there are merely two Englishmen where before there was one. All this is natural, perhaps in an island people, and people who have never lost their independence.

They understand well enough how necessary this is to fullness of self-expression. Nothing would induce them to play with it. Unless luxury and wealth have changed their whole character, they would die to a man, aye, and to a woman, in defence of it.

English Superiority.

Thus the quality that is referred to, par excellence is not merely physical courage.

It usually, of course, includes this; but here we cannot think that the individual Indian is in any way inferior. Indeed, man for man, it might be held that the comparison worked the other way. The real superiority lies in a certain idea, good or bad as we may choose to think, which makes the unity and cohesion of the English people. For good or for evil, they stand or fall together. Did they abandon the war in South Africa when they met with defeat after defeat? No, they set their teeth harder, and growled the louder and—held on. "Would that I have been Emperor of the English!" exclaimed Napoleon in the hour of defeat. "The Retreat from Moscow would not have cost me a single vote!"

The contrast.

The contrast between India and England in this respect is the contrast between an island and a continent, between the Middle Ages and the mechanical self-organisations of a modern country, on the one hand, a people of a single tribe, whose tribal jealousy is such that they could not amalgamate with the Irish or the Welsh and have only partially done so with the Scotch, because the latter are better traders than themselves; on the other hand an aggregation that has been growing since the dawn of humanity; races, tribes, languages, traditions and a thousand other elements of enrichment, any of which may be treated as a source of unity or disunity, at will. There is no comparison between the two problems. The English has been even simpler than that of Japan. The Indian is a very different matter. What is also different, however, is the relative national strengths to be evolved by its solution. Here there can be no comparison. Let the Indian millions once arrive at a simple, united idea of what they need and mean to have and nothing in the world could resist them. Some think this possible. Some think it impossible. With this question we have nothing to do. We have renounced all considerations of success or failure as well criticism of passing events. Ours is only to recognise the significance of causes, leaving results to take care of themselves. And we think that the significance of speech would be increased if our countrymen would cease lightly to say that their motherland requires Regeneration, and adopt the more accurate statement that she certainly needs self-organisation.

A THEORY OF FREEDOM.

There is no such thing as absolute freedom for the individual, except in mukti. Yet the individual has always striven for relative freedom in all directions. By this struggle for a freedom which he can understand, he makes himself ready for the supreme effort, by which he will one day gain the absolute liberty or mukti itself. Each one of the minor forms of freedom is an image or symbol of that Transcendent Freedom, and as such has the same claim upon the reverence, even of those who do not understand it as an image of God, worshipped by others, has upon one who does not worship it. The man who ceases freedom without striving for it is in so far, a lost soul, for he passes by the open door of mukti.

There are two ways in which freedom of any kind can be manifested when it is present. These are renunciation and conquest. That which we would conquer, we must first understand. We have to enter into it, to wrestle with it on given terms, to offer our very lives to it and at last to win the victory. Every success has cost at least one human sacrifice. Mastery is a kind of freedom. We can not defeat that which has us in its power.

Neither can we renounce what we have not conquered. We can not be independent of a thing which is admittedly stronger than we. In renunciation, we attain true freedom, for in renunciation we transcend strength as well as weakness. But of these two things there can be no question that one leads downwards into deeper bondage and the other outward into free air and liberty; nor can anyone be in doubt as to which does which. Conquest in an essential antecedent of renunciation. True renunciation of any thing is a step to mukti.

A man struggles for freedom, which is mastery, all his life. If he does not do so, he is not a man. He may be a clod or an idiot, a drunkard or a parasite. A man struggles and struggles to be free. Some strive for freedom for themselves alone setting up self-will or appetite in the place of their God. These are the criminals, the mad men, the failures of society. We find sometimes amongst such the nature of a child. To a child there is little difference between good and evil. He will as readily pursue the sense-gratification of robbing a pantry, as that of plucking a flower or catching a butterfly. He throws his whole heart into the effort of the moment and is, withal, full of love and loveliness. This class of child souls furnishes the Jagais and Madhais of the annals of religion, the criminals who become saints. The true criminal is steeped in tamas and egotism. He miscalls license by the name of liberty. License is not liberty for the simple reason that true liberty presupposes mastery. The profligate is the victim of his own vices. He lies helpless at their feet. He does not even enjoy his appetites. His life is spent like that of wild animal between ungovernable desire and ungovernable fear. He who would be free must first learn to govern. One who is uncontrolled is anything but free.

The free man is that man whose will is efficient. The first enemy that the will has to encounter is ignorance, the second is unbridled impulse. That these may be overcome, we submit ourselves, while the body is yet weak, to intellectual education and are initiated, at physical maturity, into the world of the ideals of our race. Such is the provision made by humanity in order that we may live strenuously, keeping the body beneath our feet; see the ideals unclouded by our own feebleness or by any grossness; and will efficiently for the triumphant achievement of the highest that we perceive. To toil, to see, to will, and to attain, this is the four-fold debt that we incur to our forefathers by the very fact of birth. A man must strive, strive to the uttermost. And since without possible success there can be no intensity of effort he must often succeed. A man's striving must begin moreover as soon after the moment when visions come to him as he judges fit. There can be no ruling, no dating, no circumscribing of his effort from outside. Human beings are born, by incessant work to increase their own faculty, by ceaseless striving to add to their inheritance. They are born to disdain limitation. It is decreed in the Counsels of God that man shall be confronted by destiny only to defy and master it; that the impossible shall to him become the possible, the one inexorable law of human life is effort to the utmost.

There is such a thing as the body-politic. Even the body-politic, however has to conform to the spiritual claim of individual man, his right, by hopeful struggle to find mukti.

The political unit furnishes new and more complex objects of attainment to the parts of which it is made up. New rights, new tasks, new ambition dawn upon us in relation to our political position. Again, nothing must defeat the right of the soul to the utmost of activity, the utmost of sacrifice, my right to serve, my right to suffer, my right to love, on the highest and widest area of which I am capable, must be defeated by nothing in the world save the greater power of my brother to do these things with equal and added nobility. And if I find this in him, since it is the ideal that I worship and not myself as the embodiment of that ideal, I shall place his feet upon my head and follow him. For in him I find the ideal, more clearly than in myself. Nothing in the world has a right to interfere with knowledge working thus hand in hand with love. Brothers standing side by side as citizens and loyal children of a common mother must be impeded by nothing in working out their duty and offering their lives to her. If a man direct his political activities towards the interests of himself or a section of his people against the welfare of his country as a whole, he is a traitor and the whole weight of the body-politic has a right to oppose and thwart him. But if his work for a class be dominated by the love of his country, then it is harmonious with the national well-being and is service and not treachery. A nation has the right to serve its country to the utmost. A nation, moreover has this one duty alone. In serving its land, it raises itself. It fulfils its debt to humanity and to the world. It recreates its own mother. A child has a right to spurn and defeat anything that could come between him and his mother, anything that would prevent his serving her to the farthest limit of his own capacity, anything that would make him into servant or slave, in one house where he was born a son.

But we must study the position of the individual in relation to this task of the body-politic. The land must be served by the nation and by the individual as a part of the nation; not as divided from it and out of relation to it. This is the truth so clearly seen by our forefathers. This is the perception to which caste witnesses so strongly. It is true that we have forgotten the meaning of caste. We see it as the limitation or assertion of our rights instead of regarding it as the regimentation of our duties. It is always thus, in an age of degradation when a people become passive and fall into static decay. We ought to be thankful for any blow that might rouse us up from so sluggish a condition. If we translate rights into duties and apply the new word as the key, many a problem will be unlocked. By our organisation into castes, we the children of India, were at one time able to divide up our labours and responsibilities amongst ourselves, giving to each group the task best suited to its capacity more or less successfully but denying the right of none to his share of the household fire, to his own form of happiness and to his own mode of self-expression. Caste was also our school of self-government and gives us to this day a sense of the value to the community of our personal opinion and a measure of the decorum which is obligatory in its expression.

But all the castes put together will in this age constitute only the social expression of Hinduism and Hinduism is no longer conterminous with the national unity. That now includes many elements once strange. Hinduism itself moreover, as befits a progressive unit has grown incalculably in its own size and complexity. It consists of a certain common fundamept of orthodoxy plus the reforming sects of the Mahomedan period plus the reforming sects of the present period. All these parts have an equal right to the name of Hindu. And similarly Hindu, Jain and Musalman have an equal right to the name of Indian. The national unity is built on place, not on language or creed or tradition, as some would have us believe, but on home. The interest of the children is one with that of the home, therefore they cannot be divided.

It follows that the task before us is to educate ourselves in the consciousness of our own unity. We have to saturate our own sub-conscious mind with the thought of it. We have so to make it a part of ourselves that we react instinctively on its behalf. Perfect harmony and mental cohesion of the body-politic is the necessary antecedant of political mastery which is another name for that relative good which we call national freedom.

There was an age when man had no family. He was incapable of the faithfulness and sustained cooperation that that institution demands. To day, we are born with the family—honour in our blood. Even the youngest child quivers under an attack on father and mother, the feeblest resents the attack of an outsider on members of the household. We are all loyal to the head of the house, all feel the delight of sacrifice for the good of the rest. Our ideals are the perfect wife, the stainless widow, the loving daughter. The mother is the central passion of her son's life. The grave tenderness of the father is the cherished memory of endless years. In the battle of life the struggle for self is transformed into the struggle for those we love.

An age will come when men shall be as tightly knit to the thought of country. Our feeling for the family is to be a gauge of our devotion to nation and motherland. By what we have already attained in the one, we can measure what we must next attain in the other. We have received promotion in the school of self-realisation. Having learnt the lesson of the family, we have next to learn that of nationality. As the individual has become the instrument of the one, so he has now to become eager tool of the other. All that force which moves in him as the vitality of egoism has to find in him a transformation point where it is converted into force of patriotism. And that this may not constitute a mere term to the aggression of the wolf-like pack, it must be lifted and redeemed by a great and holy love. Love is the spiritual reality behind the symbolism of mother and child. Even the living human mother is only the outward and visible emblem of her own infinite love. Can we not see the still vaster love that finds expression as the Motherland? It is said that there is no tie like that which binds together all the children of a single marriage. Are we not melted into unity, then, by the common love of the common land? As the human brain converts the physical energy of food into the spiritual energy of thought, so must each Indian man become an organ for the conversion of the individual struggle for individual efficiency and mastery. Victory will remain in the end with that combatant in whom the highest mind and character are indissolubly united with the greatest love—Joto Dharma Stoto Joyah.

A vague emotion is not enough however. We must serve and suffer for the objects of our love. How we serve and suffer for the family? No purpose of unity is to be trusted that has not been hammered into shape on the anvil of pain as well as joy. How are we to provide for ourselves the necessary education? A child as we have seen, in order to be made free—to be enabled to will what he will, freely and efficiently—is put under authority and expected to engage himself in the struggle for knowledge. How are we to recognize this process in the struggle for nationalization? We want to make ties outside the family as strong as family ties. How is this to be done? We want to create that new ethics which substitutes the lines of cooperative organisation for those of unity of kindred. In what form can this be brought home to the individual? In what way can he be put in direct personal contact with the lesson he is to learn? What symbol can we deliberately create in order to catch for ourselves the end of the thread by which we may hope to unravel the secret?

The first lesson we have to learn is that of implicit obedience to rightfully constituted authority. This is not the same thing as obedience to one's father. These we have the tie of love creating an impulse to self-subordination. Here the father has delegated his authority without in any way transferring the affection that belongs to him alone. We soon learn, farther, that the obedience required of us by the external authority is the same whether our heart be in it or not. Perfection of obedience can hardly be realized in the case of one whom we do not respect. But rigorous obedience to one whom we respect but do not love is a very important part of a complete training. This lesson can be learnt in many ways through our relation to our school master, the employer, the captain of the ship, the stationmaster, the leader of an expedition and so on. Authority carries with it responsibility. We must learn to subordinate our self at a moment's notice to him of whose responsibility we avail ourselves. Authority without responsibility can not be considered here since it is unlawfully constituted and amounts to spiritual anarchism. Lawful authority is permeated and regulated by its own responsibility we can not concede the one without conceding the other. And implicit obedience is the reverse of the medal, the complement of the quality, the other extreme of this pair of opposites.

He who obeys best rules best. He who rules best is most perfect in obedience. Here we come to the question of the quality of true obedience and therefore to that of the education it demands. A slave can not obey. He only does as he is forced, a very different thing. Virtue in the slave may demand wrong doing at the bidding of his master, a thing intolerable to the human conscience. His struggle for moral freedom may demand of him a crime. "When I was in slavery," said an American negro, "I always stole. It was my only way of feeling free." True obedience is unbroken but it is free. It is not exacted by force; it is rendered wholeheartedly by those who perceive that ruled and ruler are working together for a common end, collaborating in the demonstration of a single principle which commands their mutual assent. Obedience which is not this, either in fact or in potentiality is not worth receiving. It is a fact that no man of a ungoverned in pulses can successfully exercise authority. One who wishes to bear rule has first to possess himself of certain amount of self-control. True obedience is founded on respect for character. It follows from the mutualness of this object that the highest forms of rules theoretically are those in which subject and sovereign occasionally change places. From this point of view the republic is the supreme political form. There are other aspect of the question, however, which make a permanent monarchy practically desirable. England and some other western countries have compromised very ingeniously between these two institutions by the establishment of what is known as constitutional monarchy, where the actual government is in the hands of the people through their political parties and the advisory Cabinets, while the necessities of symbolism and ritual are met by the royal house in which the sovereign himself represent national stability and unity, behind the fluctuations of party.

The political system in England is only the crown of an immense life of disciplined and coordinated co-operation. It is in this giving them their immense capacity for democratic organisation at a moment's notice that the actual superiority of Englishmen lies and not in personal qualities. They breathe the atmosphere of this disciplined co-operation from their very cradle. They study it on the cricket field and in the football team. They are broken in to it by the fag system. Every small boy when he arrives at school becomes the fag of a big one who acts as his protector against all others though he bullies and thrushes him and makes him fetch and carry for himself like the veriest slave, nor is there any sense of social rank in the choice of the fag and his gurdian. The big boy may be the son of a tailor and his fag the son of a peer. They know no other relation during their school years than that of master and slave. Once the relationship is established, the heir to an earldom has to black the boots of the son of his father's shoemaker without demur. The very fact of sending a boy of ten or eleven away from home to live amongst boys who are not of his own kindred shows the value which the English place on the life that lies outside and beyond the family. The boy who lives at school has already begun to make his own way in the great world apart from his family. He early learns the reserve and privacy that belong to the deeper emotions. He cultivates a whole new series of relationships and practises the courtesies and restraints as well as the daring and personal pride that are due to these. He is in fact an individual beginning to catch a glimpse of his own powers, dreaming great dreams as to his own future and gaining experience daily in the exercise of his personal freedom. The fault of the training lies undoubtedly in the brutality and unscrupulousness which it is apt to engender. It breeds men who may be left in safety with our silva, but are utterly without restraining morality about the political rights of others. A man who has been through an English boys' school is apt to think that might is right and that to what is not material and concrete the laws of morality do not apply. That these are the faults of their education the whole of the history of their country shows.

Yet strength is good and civic and national unity is good; public order based not on force or fear, but on the mutual respect and good will of ruler and ruled is also good, nay, even essential to mankind. What is known as political freedom is not perhaps the absolute goal. Yet it is a relative duty of such dignity and rank that without it men are not altogether men, just as we can not conceive of one utterly incapable of the virtues of the family attaining to mukti. It is through perfect manhood that we achieve that which is beyond humanity and perfect manhood includes the citizen and the patriot. "The weak can not attain to that" say the Upanishads.

In that community which is made one not by ties of blood and alliance but by the infinitely subtle and spiritual bond of the common love for the common home, a man must play his part. Freedom within the nation is not freedom to enter into this duty or remain outside; it is freedom to make obedience or authority our own, according to that for which we are best fitted. And freedom for a nation, amongst the comity of nations is to stand unfettered in its quest for self-expression.

A SYSTEM OF NATIONAL EDUCATION.

SIMULTANEOUS AND SUCCESSIVE TEACHING.

CHAPTER IV.

A very remarkable feature of modern training which has been subjected in India to a reductio ad absurdum is the practice of teaching by snippets. A subject is taught a little at a time, in conjunction with a host of others, with the result that what might be well learnt in a single year is badly learned in seven and the boy goes out ill-equipped, served with imperfect parcels of knowledge, master of none of the great departments of human knowledge. The system of education adopted by the National Council, an amphibious and twy-natured creation, attempts to heighten this practice of teaching by snippets at the bottom and the middle and suddenly change it to a grandiose specialism at the top. This is to base the triangle on its apex and hope that it will stand.

The old system was to teach one or two subjects well and thoroughly and then proceed to others, and certainly it was a more rational system than the modern. If it did not impart so much varied information, it built up a deeper, nobler and more real culture. Much of the shallowness, discursive lightness and fickle mutability of the average modern mind is due to the vicious principle of teaching by snippets. The one defect that can be alleged against the old system was that the subject earliest learned might fade from the mind of the student while he was mastering his later studies. But the excellent training given to the memory by the ancients obviated the incidence of this defect. In the future education we need not bind ourselves either by the ancient or the modern system, but select only the most perfect and rapid means of mastering knowledge.

In defence of the modern system it is alleged that the attention of children is easily tired and cannot be subjected to the strain of long application to a single subject. The frequent change of subject gives rest to the mind. The question naturally arises, are the children of modern times then so different from the ancients, and, if so, have we not made them so by discouraging prolonged concentration? A very young child cannot, indeed apply himself; but a very young child is unfit for school teaching of any kind. A child of seven or eight, and that is the earliest permissible age for the commencement of any regular kind of study, is capable of a good deal of concentration if he is interested. Interest is, after all, the basis of concentration. We make his lessons supremely uninteresting and repellent to the child, a harsh compulsion the basis of teaching and then complain of his restless inattention! The substitution of a natural self-education by the child for the present unnatural system will remove this objection of inability. A child, like a man, if he is interested, much prefers to get to the end of his subject rather than leave it unfinished. To lead him on step by step, interesting and absorbing him in each as it comes, until he has mastered his subject is the true art of teaching.

The first attention of the teacher must be given to the medium and the instruments, and, until these are perfected, to multiply subjects of regular instruction is to waste time and energy. When the mental instruments are sufficiently developed to acquire a language easily and swiftly, that is the time to introduce him to many languages, not when he can only partially understand what he is taught and masters it laboriously and imperfectly. Moreover, one who has mastered his own language, has one very necessary facility for mastering another. With the linguistic faculty unsatisfactorily developed in one's own tongue, to master others is impossible. To study science with the faculties of observation, judgment, reasoning and comparison only slightly developed, is to undertake a useless and thankless labour. So it is with all other subjects.

The mother tongue is the proper medium of education and therefore the first energies of the child should be directed to the thorough mastering of the medium. Almost every child has an imagination, an instinct for words, a dramatic faculty, a wealth of idea and fancy. These should be interested in the literature and history of the nation. Instead of stupid and dry spelling and reading books, looked on as a dreary and ungrateful task, he should be introduced by rapidly progressive stages to the most interesting parts of his own literature and the life around him and behind him, and they should be put before him in such a way as to attract and appeal to the qualities of which I have spoken. All other study at this period should be devoted to the perfection of the mental functions and the moral character. A foundation should be laid at this time for the study of history, science, philosophy, art, but not in an obtrusive and formal manner. Every child is a lover of interesting narrative, a hero-worshipper and a patriot. Appeal to these qualities in him and through him, let him master without knowing it the living and human parts of his nation's history. Every child is an inquirer, an investigator, an analyser, a merciless anatomist. Appeal to these qualities in him and let him acquire without knowing it the right temper and the necessary fundamental knowledge of the scientist. Every child has an insatiable intellectual curiosity and turn for metaphysical enquiry. Use it to draw him on slowly to an understanding of the world and himself. Every child has the gift of imitation and a touch of imaginative power. Use it to give him the ground work of the faculty of the artist.

It is by allowing Nature to work that we get the benefit of the gifts she has bestowed on us. Humanity in its education of children has chosen to thwart and hamper her processes and, by so doing, has done much to thwart and hamper the rapidity of its own forward march. Happily, saner ideas are now beginning to prevail. But the way has not yet been found. The past hangs about our necks with all its prejudices and errors and will not leave us; it enters into our most radical attempts to return to the guidance of the all-wise Mother. We must have the courage to take up clearer knowledge and apply it fearlessly in the interests of posterity. Teaching by snippets must be relegated to the lumber-room of dead sorrows. The first work is to interest the child in life, work and knowledge, to develop his instruments of knowledge with the utmost thoroughness, to give him mastery of the medium he must use. Afterwards, the rapidity with which he will learn, will make up for any delay in taking up regular studies, and it will be found that, where now he learns a few things badly, then he will learn many things thoroughly well.

BAJI PURBHOU.

But to the Purbhou came with anxious eyes
 The captain of the band. "Baji," he cried,
 "The bullets fail; all the great store we had
 Of shot and powder by unsparing use Is spent, is ended." And Baji Purbhou turned;
 One look he cast upon the fallen men
 Discernible by their attire, and saw
 His ranks not greatly thinned; one look below
 Upon the thousands strewn thick the gorge,
 And grimly smiled; then where the sun in fire
 Descending stooped towards the vesper verge
 He gazed and cried; "Make iron of your souls.
 And yet, if Bhavani wills strength and the sword
 Can stay our nation's future from overthrow Till victory with Shivaji return."
 And so they waited without word or sound,
 And over them the silent afternoon
 Waited; the hush terrestrial was profound Except the mountains and the fallen men
 No sight, no voice, no movement was abroad,
 Only a few black-winged slow-circling birds
 That wandered in the sky; only the wind
 That now arose and almost noiselessly
 Questioned the silence of the wooded sides,
 Only the occasional groan that marked the pang
 By some departing spirit on its frame
 Inflicted. And from time to time the gaze
 Of Baji sought the ever-sinking sun.
 Men fixed their eyes on him and in his firm
 Expression lived. So the slow minutes passed.
 But when the sun dipped very low, a stir
 Was felt far off, and all men grasped their swords
 Tighter and put a strain upon their hearts.
 Resolved at last the stream of Mogul war
 Came once more pouring, not the broken rout
 Of Pathans, not discouraged Rajput swords,
 But Agra's chivalry glancing with gold
 And scimiters inlaid and coloured robes.
 Swiftly they came expecting the assault
 Firewinged of bullets and the lethal ram,
 But silence met them and to their intent
 So ominous it seemed, a while they paused, Fearing some ruse, though for much death prepared.
 Yet careful of prevention. Reassured,
 Onward with a high shout they charged the slope.
 No bullet sped, no musket spoke; unhurt
 They crossed the open space, unhurt they climbed

The rise; but even as their hands surprised
 The shrubs that fringed the vantage, sword unseen
 Hacked at their fingers, through the bushes thrust
 Lances from warriors unexposed bore through Their bosoms. From behind the nearest lines
 Pressed on to share their fate and still the son
 Of men bore onward till with violent strain
 They reached the perilous crest; there for a while
 A slaughter grim went on and all the verge
 Was heaped and walled and thickly fortified
 With splendid bodies. But as they were piled,
 The raging hosts behind tore down their dead
 And mounted, till at last the force prevailed
 Of obstinate numbers and upon a crest Swarming with foemen fought against desperate odds
 The Southron few. Small was the space for fight
 And meeting strength with skill and force with soul.
 The strong and agile keepers of the hills
 Prevailed against the city-dwelling hosts,
 With covert and the swiftly stabbing blades
 O'erpowering all the feints of Agra's schools
 So fought they for a while; then suddenly Upon the Purbhou all the Goddess came Loud like a lion hungry on the hills
 He shouted, and his stature seemed to increase.
 Striding upon the foe. Rapid his sword
 Like lightning playing with a cloud, made void
 The crest before him. On his either side
 The swordsmen of the south with swift assault
 Prevented the reply, till like a bank
 Of some wild river the assault collapsed
 Over the stumbling edge and down the rise
 And once again the desperate moment passed.
 The relics of the murderous strife remained,
 Corpses and jewels, broodery and gold.
 But not for this would they accept defeat.
 Once more they came and almost held. The wrath
 Rose in the Purbhou and he roused himself
 In soul to make an end; but even then
 A stillness fell upon his mood and all
 That god-like impulse faded from his heart.
 And passing out of him a mighty form
 Stood visible, Titanic, scarlet-clad,
 Dark as a thundercloud, with streaming hair
 Obscuring heaven, and in her sovran grasp
 The sword, the flower, the boon, the bleeding head

Bhavani.—Then she vanished, the daylight
Was ordinary in a common world!
And Bajji knew the goddess formidable
Who watches over India till the end.
Even then a sword found out his shoulder, sharp
A Mogul lance ran grinding through his arm.
Fiercely around him gathered in a knot
The mountaineers; but Bajji, with a groan,
"Moro Deshpande, to the other side
Hasten of the black gorge and bring me word.
Pides any from the west, or canst thou hear
The Raigarh trumpets blow? I know my hour
Is ended; let me know my work is done."
He spoke and shouted high the organ loud,
Desperate, he laboured at the man strength,
To push the Mogul from the gorge's end
With a slow compulsion. By his side fell fast
Mahratta and Mogul and on his limbs
The swords drank blood, a single redness grew
His body, yet he fought. Then at his side Ghastly with wounds and in his fiery eyes
Death and rejoicing, a dire figure stood,
Moro Deshpande: "Bajji, I have seen
The Raigarh lances; Bajji, I have heard
The trumpets." Conquering with his cry the din
He spoke, then dead upon a Mogul corpse
Fell prone. And Bajji with a gruesome hand
Wiping the blood from his fierce staring eyes
Saw round him only fifteen men erect
Of all his fifty. But in front, behind,
On either side the Mogul held the gorge.
Groaning once more the grim Mahratta turned
And like a bull with lowered horns that runs,
Charged the exultant foe behind. With him
The desperate survivors hacking ran
And as a knife cuts instantly its way
Through water, so the yielding Mogul wall
Was cleft and closed behind. Eight men alone
Stood in the gorge's narrow end, not one Unwounded. There where hardly three abreast
Have room to stand, they faced again the foe.
And from this latest hold Bajji beheld
Mounting the farther incline, rank on rank
A mass of horsemen; galloped far in front
Some forty horse, and on a turbaned head

Bright in the glory of the sinking sun
A jewelled aigrette blazed. And Bajji looked Over the wide and yawning field of space
And seemed to see a fort upon a ridge,
Raigarh; then turned and sought again the war.
So for few minutes desperately they strove,
Man after man of the Mahrattas fell
Till only these were left. Then suddenly Bajji stood still and sank upon the ground.
Quenched was the fiery gaze, never less the arm,
Bajji lay dead in the unconquered gorge.
But ere he fell upon the rocks behind
The horse hooves ring and as the latest left
Of the two hundred died, the bullets thronged
Through the two narrow mouth and hurled them down
Who entered. Clamorous, exultant blared
The Southron trumpets but with stricken hearts
The swords of Agra back recoiled; fatal
Upon their serried unprotected mass
In hundreds from the verge the bullets rained,
And in a quick disordered stream, appalled,
The Mogul rout began. Sure-footed, swift
The hostile strength pursued, Suryaji first Shouting aloud and singing to the hills
A song of Ramdas as he smote and slew.
But Shivaji by Bajji's empty frame
Stood silent and his gaze was motionless
Upon the dead. Tanaji Malsure
Stood by him and observed the breathless corpse,
Then slowly said, "Thirty and three the gates
By which thou enterest heaven, thou fortunate
Thou valiant heart. So when my hour arrives,
May I too clasp my death, saving the land
Or winning some great fortress for my lord."
But Shivaji beside the corpse beheld
A dim and mighty cloud that held a sword,
And in its other hand where once the head
Depended bleeding, raised the turban bright
From Bajji's head, still glittering with its gems,
And placed it on the chief's. But as it rose
Blood-stained with the heroic sacrifice,
Round the aigrette he saw a golden crown.

NEED OF CITIZENSHIP AND SANNAYS.

Every religion centres round some particular idea: Ancient Egypt round death, Persia round the mystery of Good and Evil; Christianity round the redeeming love of a divine Incarnation. Only Hinduism aims at the heights of Vairagya and Mukti, and at nothing secular. This is indeed the weak point of Hinduism as the Swami Vivekananda so often said. "Only renunciation and mukti in this shop! Nothing for the householder was his half-jocular way of referring to the want he felt keenly.

The quality, by which Hinduism has it in her power to make up for this defect of her greatness, is her capacity for synthesising every religious idea with which she comes in contact. The absorptive power of Hinduism as a religion coupled with its resistant power as a civilisation, furnishes one of the most startling paradoxes in the history of man. Derived originally from a veritable network of religions, in which the co-ordinating element was the philosophy now known as vedanta, it has thrown out reforming sects in Mahomedan period, and thrown out reforming sects in the Christian period, each of these being in fact the expression of its admiration for the new ideal of which it has caught a glimpse.

To-day, however, Hindus see that the greatest call upon the religious instincts of the country, lies in the need of assimilating whole new areas of life. We must make possible the 'short views' of the Christians. There must be some religious teaching and encouragement for those who only want heaven not mukti. There must be a recognition of righteousness, as well as of holiness. Righteousness lies in duty done; holiness acquires renunciation. A thousand good citizens are necessary, as the background of one great Sannyasin. There must be a philosophy of citizenship, as well as of Sannyas.

And in truth the exaltation of one thing does not demand the decrying of its fellow. The ideal is always infinite, always divine. A highly moralised society, produces the greatest saints. The purity of fathers and mothers makes possible the birth of Avatars. Where marriage is faithfully kept there sincere Sannyas is possible, not amongst profligates and riotous lives. Similarly, the presence of honorable citizens is necessary to the maintenance of a grand religious ideal and the citizens are necessary to its manifestation as the monk.

But if this is so we have to search one ancient scriptures with a new aim. We must seek for all that can support and encourage us in doing manfully the work of the present world. Renunciation can be achieved through duty quite as well as by the abandonment of duty. We have thousands of texts to tell us so but the prevailing preconception in favour of Sannyas has led to our ignoring all that favours dharma. The weak point of European society lies in the absence of the monastic ideal. True. But equally sure is it that the weak point of Hinduism is the want of emphasis on the ideal of the householder and the citizen.

The reason lies largely in the fact that when our texts were formulated our society was in rich in virtue as in material resources. When the last of these deserts us, it is difficult to prevent the decay of the former; and what is wanted to day is a deliberate recapture of both.

For this we must exalt work. We must look upon the world at a school in which it is worth while to shine for promotion from class to class we must set our shoulder to the wheel and struggle unceasingly to attain the end we have set before ourselves. Our philosophy tells us that absolute progress is impossible, in the things of this life. But relative progress is fully possible and while we move on this plane of relativity, we must work as if perfection would rework the very next step.

Let us set before ourselves the master ideals, even in things relative "I don't make good screws, Sir, I make the best that can be made" said an indignant workman in reply to too casual an enquiry. This ought to be our attitude. We must make the best screws that can possibly be made. In every direction it must be the same. The best not too good, the highest not too difficult, for us to attain. Nothing less than the utmost. Nothing easy. Nothing cheap. The same energy that might have made an ascetic will also make a workman, if that will better serve the Mother's purpose.

And let our ideals be higher for our friends also. Let no man consort with mean company. Monk or citizen, let a man be noble. Whether Brahmin or Pariah let him practise self-respect, and demand the like from others. We help no one by being so passive as to convert him into a brute.

In the school, the lessons are graduated, but all alike are Education. All are equally the concern of the school authorities. Even so with our civilization, the integrity of the man of business is to the full as acceptable an offering as the renunciation of the monk, for unless there be honest men of the world, the religious order must come to an end.

Thus Hinduism fully recognising the need of the practical and secular life, and drawing from within herself, the stores that are necessary for its development and growth, synthesises once more ideals that seemed opposite. The Super-Social life is seen in its true relation to Society. The goal is preached as attainable, not only by the Sadhu in the forest, but also by the butcher in the town, and the wife in the home.

INDIA IN A NEW LIGHT. RESEARCHES OF DR. P. C. ROY. (Down Magazine.)

Dr. Praphulla Chandra Ray, D. Sc., Ph. D., Senior Professor of Chemistry at the Calcutta Presidency College, better known throughout the world as Dr. P. C. Ray, the discoverer of Mercurous Nitrite and many other similar nitrogen compounds, has in the department of scientific history achieved results which will live for all time and rescue the fair fame of India from a stigma which he has shown to be thoroughly undeserved. The reproach incessantly cast at India so long, has been that in her past she was too subjective; too metaphysical, too otherworldly, and that her downfall was by reason of her impracticalness, her otherworldliness, her speculative non-scientific spirit. Thus, the Indians had always hitherto been credited with a knowledge only of deep and abstract philosophy and also of the mathematical and medical sciences; but latest researches in the department of scientific history as revealed in Dr. P. C. Ray's two volumes of that monumental work "History of Hindu Chemistry," have indisputably established the fact that in ancient India Chemistry was zealously and successfully cultivated. This historical discovery has completely revolutionised European public opinion on the subject and that great German author, Hermann Schelenz, one of the greatest of the living authorities on Pharmaceutical Chemistry and author of the History of Pharmacy ("Geschichte der Pharmazie") has gone into ecstasy over Dr. P. C. Ray's History of Hindu Chemistry, and has authoritatively declared as his deliberate opinion that the mastery of chemical processes as elaborately described in the Hindu work, Rasaratna-Samuchaya upon which Dr. Ray has copiously drawn in his History, shows that the Hindu chemists were far ahead of their European contemporaries of the 13th and 14th centuries A. D. Before the publication of the first volume of the History, the world had a very meagre idea of the scientific acumen of the ancient Hindus in the department of Chemistry. But since its publication "a new and interesting chapter has been added to the history of Sciences and of human progress,—we are quoting the words of Mons. P. E. Berthelot that great French scientist of the last century whose synthesis of Formic Acid and of Alcohol researches in thermochemistry and agricultural chemistry have now become classic. In the other volume, which was published last year and which is a continuation of the first, Dr. Ray has gone further and made good the claim of Hindu Chemistry to a scientific development, independent of the Greek, or indeed, any other foreign influence. He has shown that the development of Hindu Chemistry is the outcome of the arduous and continuous efforts of the different sages, prominent among whom was Nagarjuna, in the pursuit of alchemy or chemistry. In his treatise on alchemy (chemistry.) Rasa ratnakara Nagarjuna comes in as a friend of King Sahivahana—a connexion which has the support of an old tradition, as also his disciple Ratnaghoat. Alchemy was introduced into the sphere of Buddhism by Nagarjuna having been almost neglected up to the time. Mons. Sylvain Levi, one of the foremost orientalist and scientists of the day writing a review of Dr. Ray's History (vol. II) in the columns of a leading French journal, Journal Asiatique records the following observations: Dr. Ray has undoubtably proved the grand rôle played by Buddhist monks in alchemy and the preponderating part of Buddhism in Tantric literature." Even in the 13th century A. D. continues the same authority, "the Hindu chemist; Govinda-charya, the author of Basava declares to have composed his work after having derived his information from Buddhist sources, as also from the Buddhist of Tibet." Besides Buddhist chemists, as noted by Mons. Levi in the course of the same review, there were a good many Hindu chemists, and "Dr. Ray notices a good many Hindu chemical tantras and gives the summary of them and continues the list up to the 17th century A. D." (Sylva in Lire) Among these Hindu chemical works reviewed by Dr. Ray in his book, the following may be specially mentioned,—(1) Rasendracharman, (2) Rasendrachintamani (3) Rasaratnasamuchaya and (4) Rasaura, the last two of which have already been referred to. The part played by Buddhist monks in the development of the chemical science was indeed remarkable; but it should be noted, the author of Hindu Chemistry shows that the Buddhist Tantras concerning the science received their development in the Hindu Tantric works on Chemistry and were indeed finally absorbed in them.

II.

Indeed, the picture of chemical knowledge in ancient India which Dr. Ray unfolds before the astonished gaze of the modern Indian, as well as the modern European, is fascinating to a degree. Dr. Ray has traced the history of Chemistry in India, from the pre-Buddhist times down to the middle of the 16th century A. D. He has divided the whole period under four divisions of time, namely, 1. the Aryanvedic, 2. the Transitional, 3. the Tantric, and 4. the later-chemical periods; the first extending from the pre-Buddhist era to the 9th century A. D., the second from the 9th to the 12th century, the third from the 12th to the 14th, and the fourth from the 14th to 1550 A. D. The greatest name in Hindu Chemistry is, as we have seen, Nagarjuna of the second century A. D., the author of Rasaratnakara. Nagarjuna's zeal in the study of the science was emulated by a succession of devoted Buddhist monks, with the result that a considerable number of Buddhist alchemical tantras were produced. To Dr. Ray belongs the credit of bringing out prominently into view "the grand rôle played by the Buddhist monks in alchemy and the preponderating part of Buddhism in the tantric literature." To repeat the words, already quoted, of Mons. Levi. In Dr. Ray's second volume of Hindu Chemistry, published last year (the first volume having originally appeared in 1901), some fifteen new chemical tantras have been brought to light, most of them buried in oblivion, in dark recesses, in tattered manuscripts. Says Dr. Ray,

"when the first volume was under preparation it was feared many valuable works on Hindu Chemistry referred to in Rasaura, Rasaratnasamuchaya, etc., have been lost for ever." Some of these, hitherto supposed to have been lost, have been recovered by Dr. Ray through a vigorous search in the libraries of Benaras, Kashmir, Nepal and the Deccan. The chemical work Rasaura to which Dr. Ray refers belongs to the third period of Hindu Chemistry 9th to 12th century A. D., whose text is being edited in the Bibliotheca Indica by Dr. Ray, in collaboration with Pandit Harish Chandra Kavirata of Calcutta. The other chemical work, Rasaratnasamuchaya, belongs to the fourth period—fourteenth, sixteenth century A. D. The search in the Durbar Library of Nepal, has been productive of one striking result namely, the discovery of an old Saiva Tantra on Chemistry the Kubjika-tantra which is copied in Gupta characters of the sixth century A.D. The search in the Deccan libraries has led to the discovery of many Buddhist Tantras dealing with Chemistry. The Deccan was completely cut off from all outside intercourse, and says Dr. Ray "it is precisely in these regions, which were cut off from all intercourse with the outside world, that Indian alchemy flourished." Among the many chemical works which the Doctor has rescued from oblivion, the most worthy of mention are, 1. the Buddhist Tantra, Rasaratnakara, which is a later redaction of an earlier work by Nagarjuna; 2. the Rasavidya of Bhikshu Govinda and 3. the Rasaratnasamuchaya of the fourth period of Hindu Chemistry. The chemical tantras, Buddhist and Hindu, to which we have referred, are evidently later works; but earlier evidences of possession of chemical knowledge by the Hindus are preserved and incorporated in general medical works, like the Sankhita of Charaka and Susruta, or the Ashtangahridaya of Vagbhata or the still later works of Vrinda and Chakrapani Datta.

As usual, some of our foreign critics have been telling us that the knowledge by the earlier Hindu medical writers (Charaka and Susruta for instance, must have been borrowed knowledge; for, how could, India in those ancient days aspire to a knowledge which has come to the European through the slow growth of the centuries? Thus, Mons. Berthelot, the French savant, to whom Dr. Ray owed indeed, his inspiration in his historical investigations into Indian Chemistry,—was so much struck with the originality of the Hindu process of preparing caustic alkali as given in the Susruta Samhita, that he went so far as to suggest that that portion of Susruta was modern, and in fact, a later addition derived from contact with European chemists. But, thanks to the labours of Dr. Ray, the indigenous character of the origin and growth of Hindu Chemistry has been firmly established. A whole chapter has been devoted to a consideration of the indigenous sources of Indian Chemistry; and Dr. Ray has been able to produce a mass of evidence in support of that position. Thus to refute Prof. Berthelot, with special reference to the question of the Hindu process of preparing caustic alkali, Dr. Ray mentions two other Hindu medical writers, Vagbhata and Chakrapani Datta, both of whom lived before the 11th century A.D. and both of whom refer to the particular chemical process described by Susruta. Another independent piece of evidence cited by the Doctor is the fact that caustic alkali was used for the cauterization of bad wounds, as mentioned in the "questions of King Milinda, who flourished in the second century B.C." And in various other ways the Doctor has established the claim of the originality of the Hindus and has shown that, far from borrowing the knowledge of Chemistry from the West, the Hindus were rather the teachers of the Arabians (the Moors) who in their turn helped to spread it in Europe. The comparatively modern dates of Hindu Tantric works on Chemistry, together with the fact that the Moors made great progress in alchemy and medicine in a previous period of history, suggested the idea to the minds of many scholars that the Hindus were largely indebted to the Moors for their chemical knowledge as displayed in their works. But the theory of borrowing from the Moors, although plausible, has been completely knocked on the head by Dr. Ray who has shewn that in the Middle Ages of about the time of the Mahomedan invasion of India, the Hindus far from remaining behind the Arabs and the Westerns were, in their knowledge of chemical and metallurgical processes, far ahead of their contemporaries in other parts of the world. Also, it is acknowledged on all hands that the great Buddhist patriarch to whom we have so often referred Siddha Nagarjuna as he was called of the second century A. D. was the discoverer of the chemical processes of distillation, sublimation, etc. And lastly, the grand rôle played by Buddhist monks in the development of the chemical science has been indisputably established by Dr. Ray and the proofs adduced by him have been accepted by scholars and savants. And we have seen also, that the Hindu Tantric chemical works were only a development of the Buddhist Tantric works on the subject. And lastly, not only in the department of Inorganic Chemistry but also in Organic Chemistry, the Hindus had made an advance, and Principal B. N. Seal of the Cooch Behar College, Bengal,—in an independent section which is incorporated in Dr. Ray's History—has given an account of the constitution of the fats and oils and the organic tissues. "He has also briefly noticed the chief chemical industries of the Hindus which secured for them an easy preeminence in manufactures for a thousand years; and has unearthed some interesting Hindu recipes relating to matters of chemical technology, e.g. searing of hard rocks to enable them to cut or pulverised; hardening of steel, of cements for rock's metals etc."

Thus, the labours of Dr. Ray in the department of scientific history have borne abundant fruit in the discovery of documents which no amount of cavilling may reject or repudiate, and which go to show that the development of Hindu Chemistry in ancient India was the outcome of Hindu genius and Hindu originality and of arduous and continuous efforts of Hindu sages in the pursuit of the science.

Dr. Ray had, indeed, raised India in the estimation of the civilised world by his brilliant chemical discoveries. But his latest achievement his two volumes on the History of Hindu Chemistry, has secured for her a lasting place in the intellectual hierarchy of nations.

REFUTATION OF MATERIALISM.

In Hindu Philosophy one misses the elaborate and long-drawn arguments for the immortality of the soul which form a prominent feature of the philosophical Theology of Europe. The explanation of this is no doubt to be found in the general unanimity of Hindu philosophers as regards the doctrine in question. All the six orthodox schools of Hindu Philosophy agree in thinking of the soul as not only immortal, but also as eternal. The heterodox school of Buddhist Philosophy too accepts the doctrine in a modified form. It is only out-and-out Materialists like the Charvâkas that questioned it. There was therefore little occasion for our philosophers spending time and energy in proving that the soul does not perish with the body. But that the Materialist's arguments were not left quite unheeded, appears from controversial passages here and there in Hindu philosophical works,—passages which are apparently directed against the heretics just mentioned. For instance, in his commentary on the fifty-third and fifty-fourth aphorisms of the third pâda, third chapter, of the Brahmasûtras, Sankara first states and then argues against the views of the Lokayatikas or Charvakas. The aphorisms commented upon occur in a place where no one would expect them, which shows perhaps that they were the result of an after-thought on the part of the author and the little interest he felt in the superficial speculations of the Materialists. I shall, however, give the substance of both the arguments of these philosophers as stated by Sankara and his refutation of those arguments. The reasonings of the Materialists amount to this:

"Though consciousness is hidden in external objects, it becomes manifest in these objects when they form an organism, just as the intoxicating power hidden in certain objects is manifested when they are made into wine. There is, therefore, no soul apart from the body, which capable of either going to heaven or attaining liberation. The properties of an object are those that exist while it exists and cease to exist in its absence. Heat and light are, in the sense, properties of fire. Now, the vital functions, sensibility, memory and the like, which are believed to be properties of the soul, are found in the body, and not found without the body. They are, therefore, not the properties of an extra-organic object, but really properties."

Sankara's reply, which is an amplification of the aphorism referred to, is, in substance, this:

"If the properties of the soul are to be set down as properties of the body because they exist while the body exists, why should not they be concluded as not properties of the body for their not existing while the body exists. Form and such other qualities, which are really properties of the body, exist so long as the body exists; but the vital functions and the rest do not exist in the body after death. Besides, form and other properties like it are perceived even by others, but the properties of the soul, sensibility, memory, etc., are not perceived by any one else than the soul to which they belong. Then, again, one knows the existence of these properties in the body while it lives; how can one be sure that at the destruction of one body they are not transmitted to another? Even the possibility of this refutes Materialism. Then, as to the true character of consciousness, the Materialist will perhaps admit that consciousness is the knowledge of matter and material objects. If so, he must also admit that inasmuch as matter and material objects are objects of consciousness, it cannot be their property. For matter to perceive matter is as impossible as it is for fire to burn itself, and for a dancer to climb upon his own shoulders. Form and other properties of matter cannot, we see, make themselves or other properties their objects. Inasmuch, therefore, as consciousness makes both internal and external things its objects, it is not a material property. If its distinction from material objects be admitted, its independence of them must also be admitted. Moreover, its identity in the midst of changing circumstances proves its eternality. Remembrance and such states of the mind become possible only because the knowing self is recognised as the same in two successive states. Thus, in the consciousness 'I saw this before' the seeing and the recognising self is known as the same. The argument that because perception takes place while the body exists, therefore it is a property of the body, has already been refuted. It is as valid an argument as that because perception takes place while such materials as lamps, etc. The body is only an instrument of perception like lamps, etc. Nor is the body absolutely necessary even as an instrument of perception, inasmuch as a variety of perceptions takes place in the state of dreaming, when the body is inactive. Thus the existence of the soul as something different from the body, is an irresistible fact."

SWAMI ABHEDANANDA IN LONDON.

One of the means of obtaining perfect self-control over mind and body is exercise in the correct method of breathing. This may not come as a surprise upon us, but it seems to have produced no small impression upon the people in London where the Swami Abhedananda explained it to them. To Swamiji holds a class there to which students flock for taking lessons; and the report goes that the number is fast going up. When some of these students were interviewed by the press representatives, the former seem to have given an en-phatically favourable view of the new teaching. Here is what the Swamiji himself told the representatives:—

"By proper breathing exercises," said the Swami, "a man may develop sufficient will-power to counteract even the forces of gravitation. For example, he could throw himself off a chair by merely willing to do so. He could also withdraw his subtle self, or what some call his 'astral self,' from his body while reclining on a couch, and literally stand side and look at his body lying there. To suspend the action of the heart and pulse for some seconds is one of simplest of feats. I teach the fundamental principles of Christian Science, which have been taught in India for ages, with this difference, that scientific breathing, as opposed to mere faith, is the means I employ. Self cure is easy by the religion of Vedanta, which means 'the end of wisdom.' For example if a person has toothache or neuralgia, or other acute pain it is possible by employing the correct breathing exercise to withdraw the mind's attention entirely from the locality of the pain, thereby conquering it as completely as if an anaesthetic had been used. There is nothing that psychical societies have discovered which cannot be accomplished by following my method of breathing. All the student has to do is to practise half an hour twice a day, and perfect health of mind and body will result. By breathing exercises, I mean that process by which control of the lungs and nerve centres and command over the vital energy can be obtained. The Yogi declares that the practice of scientific breathing will bring whatever result is desired, whether physical, psychical, or spiritual."

The Swami attached no great importance to diet or temperance in food or drink, while smoking, he said, "did not matter." Given a well-trained will and a mastery over the rejuvenating art of breathing, all other things were of minor importance. The will became a sort of alchemist, that made everything minister to the best interests of body and the highest interests of the mind.

ALL IS LOVE.

To know is to love truth.

What is Truth? Truth is Love.

Step by step this love manifested itself through different stages as the force of affinity, cohesion, gravitation, greed, desire, ambition, aspiration. In different modes and degrees of vibrations this Love appeared being known as Magnetism, Electricity, Light, heat, sound, etc. The most accurate conception of the material atoms being as "Centres of forces." Matter itself in the ultimate analysis resolves itself into concentrated Love. All Law nothing more than the discovery of unity in diversity, harmony in heterogeneity, unison in variety, is itself a phase of Love. In your inquisitive detectives, insidious spies, suspected friends, menacing foes, betraying comrades, there is no other power at work but Love. No other Government rules the world than Love. Carlyle said "Hatred is inverted love." Fear is only congested love. Else how could love conquer fear? A man with a purse of thousand pounds in the woods is full of fear only because of the loved gold. A free man greets all he meets. A free person enjoys the uniform circulation of love. Love being the only force there in reality, the realization of identity with love is salvation and redemption and the conscious or unconscious struggle to achieve that absolute Love-consciousness is life, to be willing to follow the line of quickest approach to that goal is wisdom, and to that end to rightly adjust the different love forces is virtue.

There is no such thing as betrayal of love nor is anybody a traitor. No right have we to limit our ideas as to the possibilities of man on the ground of his being a Jew, Mahomedan, Shudra or Brahman. Even the sworn slaves of dogmas are bound to be redeemed. God, Truth, must pull you out from the clasp of conventionality and conservatism, even as Krishna drew out the Gopikas from the homes of their so-called husbands.

Man's real self is nothing but this transcendental Love. You are Love. Oh you are the universal self. You are the Roseate Dandy that flushes in the blooming cheeks of Lelli on the one side and appears as the bleeding heart of Majnoon on the other. To realize and feel this truth in practical life is Purity. But he who begins to seek things and hankers after them as if not one with him reads his God-self atwain and is thereby impure. Shunning and curling up is not Purity; resisting and avoiding beauty is not chastity. True Purity is that where all beauty is absorbed in me and I feel and enjoy my spiritual oneness with all to such an extent that to talk or think of meeting any object sounds like a painful hint of separation,

THE Cheap Edition of KARMAYOGIN.

The difficulty felt by many students and educated men of small means in buying the KARMAYOGIN at its ordinary price of two annas, has been so much pressed on our attention that we have found it necessary to bring out a cheaper edition at one anna a copy. It is not an easy thing in this country to establish a weekly review of this standard written in English, and it has therefore been necessary for us at the outset to place a price on the paper which should ensure its being self-supporting even with a limited circulation. The KARMAYOGIN, however, is now sufficiently successful to allow of a concession of this kind being made without financial injury. The subscribers to the superior edition will be compensated by the superior get-up and paper, while the cheaper edition will remove the grievance of the large number who have hitherto been debarred from reading the review by their scanty means.

PASSING THOUGHTS.

A Nation of Students.

We are a nation of students. The whole East is full of students. No figure in the streets of an Asiatic city,—whether the country be India, Persia, or China,—is so representative as that of the student. No power is so pervasive as the school-master's might make itself, if maintained in harmony with the general aspiration. Why this prominence of the learner? What is the explanation? Does it point to a national immaturity? If so, let us face the fact. There is no advantage to be gained, by shutting our eyes to the position of affairs; on the contrary clear thought is itself the starting point of a good fight with crudity and ignorance.

National Immaturity.

We must remember that the very words are foreign, in which this question is being discussed. We are, in fact, measuring ourselves and the maturity of our culture, against a modern and western standard. So measured, we are decidedly immature. There are many practical situations in life, where, beside the ease and mastery of the European, we feel ourselves mere children. Is this immaturity, then, an absolute, or only a relative truth? Is it perhaps true that all the people of the world are more or less immature?

We cannot, get the whole material advantage, out of a given situation as easily as the European can. But no one who has ever engaged in serious conversation with Europeans can doubt that there are many subjects on which they are, beside us, extremely childish. In the field of religions and philosophical speculation, they find it difficult to generalise, and propositions that are obvious to us will puzzle them severely. The same is true of the psychology of social relations. In the culture of the family, Europeans are curiously lacking. That whole idea of play, that shines through all our domestic intercourse, and lubricates all the friction of intimacy, appears to be unborn amongst them. Here they are as immature as we in their field. Those strong faces, with their closed lips and air of instinctive mastery, notify us of nothing genial and easy, in the nature behind. Similarly, in us, the grave refined type of old men, indicates no large public experience. All the lineaments have been carved, in the one case, by contacts with the larger world, the world of struggle and complexities, of clashing interests, and grim affairs; and in the other, by quiet experience of love and suffering, by the thought of God, and by the garnered wisdom of the home. Either European or Hindu, on his own ground, will appear unassailable; judged by the opposite standard, seem unripe, crude, but half-cultured and childish in his powers.

The Test of Success.

Unfortunately for us, however, the world is being re-made, at this moment, by European culture. Its assimilation is the means and the test of success. With regard to it we are mere students. Then we are all students. It may be that when our lesson is learnt, there will be a compensating one for Europe to learn. That is not our business. Our business is to learn our own. Is it the foreign idea that we have to accept? Not exactly. The foreign idea, as it stands, would merely give us moral indigestion. We should become a nation of moral dyspeptics. But we have to find, in our own stock of ideas, that one which enables us to meet the foreign nation on our own terms. The Englishman loves England, with a wonderful and often beautiful love. What we have to learn from this, is not to share his love for England. That would be the discipleship of monkeys, mere imitation. We have to learn to meet his love for England with an equal, deeper, more tender and far more intelligent love for India. As he professes to make his country and his people the centre of every activity, every thought, so we have really to make our people and our country the centre of our own. He has unity of national intention. We must realise our own national intention, and find an equal unity in it. Swadharma—"Better for each man is his own duty, however badly done, than the duty of another, though that be easy."

The Power of Mind.

All power is in the human mind. We can master anything, simply by giving our attention to it. Even the ideals of the West, the ideals of the new age, are within our grasp, if we study them, if we recognise their necessity, and proceed to work them out. It is natural, however, that under the circumstances, feeling as we do, that the study of our own circumstances, and of the new ideals that are to initiate a new age, is the one duty that devolves upon us, it is natural that education should seem to us the supreme ground of battle for our national rights. No one who stands outside the Indian community can dream of the jealousy with which the students watch all attempts to curtail or limit their numbers. Records are kept, and accurate news is carried, that would astonish those most concerned, if they knew of it, as to how opportunities are shrinking, and by whose action, in this direction or that. A short time ago fees were raised in a certain college. Now, nearly half the students are to be turned out. All this is noted and discussed amongst the students. Their eyes are not shut, nor are they slow to draw their own inferences from the facts. And there is nothing that so stirs them, for all the apparent silence that hangs over the country, as this withdrawal of the means of knowledge.

Nor is this unnatural. Education is our one overwhelming want, in this hour of the nation's history. Knowledge we must have. And knowledge we are determined to have. An immense force has been called into being, by the organisation of schools and colleges. But once evoked, such forces must be fed and developed along sound lines. It is at their peril that mortals attempt to stand in the path of avalanche or the cannon-ball. Is it imagined that mind-energy is less dangerous than material? Only the bravest, because he may offer himself as a sacrifice. The grossest, because he does not believe that mind is a force, like any other, and rules the world, does not believe that a poor weapon in the hands of Napoleon Bonaparte is more deadly than the best, when used by a coward or a fool, cannot understand, till it has turned and rent him, the perils of the great force called into being, and then subjected to the crushing weight of suppression.

THE LAWS OF THOUGHT.

Thought builds the universe. The mind alone is real. All that is seen is but a dream. There is such a thing as the conscious holding of a thought. When this is done, all that opposes it, or seems contradictory to it, gradually melts away, and we wonder what has become of it, or why we were at one time under its illusion.

Anything may be achieved by thought. Death, disease, poverty, humiliation, any or all of these may be overcome. The one thought, "I am the strong! I am the strong!" earnestly held, calmly, confidently, unwaveringly and yet silently asserted, is enough. In the presence of one strong thought, all of a contrary opinion or party become apologetic, and seek to defend themselves, or to explain why they cannot quite agree. And this without one word being said.

Immense batteries may be made, by numbers of people uniting together to think a given thought. If the whole of India could agree to give, say ten minutes every evening, at the oncoming of darkness, to thinking a single thought, "We are one. We are one. Nothing can prevail against us, to make us think we are divided. For we are one. We are one, and all antagonisms amongst us are illusion,"—the power that would be generated, can hardly be measured.

The force ought always to be used in constructive forms. We ought always to devote it to what are called positive ends. We ought never to use it for hatred or jealousy or anger, but always in love and faith, and for the upbuilding of something. Even when evil is to be destroyed, or a lie overcome, we must think of the truth that is to be revealed, or the good to be done, and not the evil or the falsehood.

The use of mental powers for directly destructive ends has always been regarded as accursed. It is what the West calls black magic, and certainly recoils upon the user in every terrible ways. A large beneficence should distinguish the man who knows the power of his own thought. He should not, indeed, assert two conflicting goods at the same time. But out of all that is possible, he should select that, which for reasons that he apprehends, is most admirable, and desirable, and concentrate upon it. As this emerges into fact, he will find that all that opposes it, is automatically banished or destroyed. The confusion of wishing this and that in opposite directions, is the ordinary way of the ordinary world. This way represents a clearing and rationalising of the ground, it means a dealing scientifically with our own desires, in such a way as to make them realisable by the world about us.

The less selfish the things we wish for, the greater and keener will be the accumulated and multiplied power of our thought-battery. "Awake, awake, great India!" is an ejaculation which, said, within the mind, quietly, by hundreds of thousands of persons at a given hour, would produce immeasurable force, in proportion to depth of their concentration on the thing itself. Our thought must be cleared and ordered. When this is done, we shall see, to our surprise, that it has become creative. The world without begins to reflect the world within. Men and women become incarnated ideas. Let us take the question of education, for instance. At this moment, it seems to be slipping out of our grasp. What we have to dread is being turned into a nation of toolies and peonies, like the people of Java and the process is making great headway. But what right have we to depend on anyone but ourselves, for the preventing of this? What obstacle has anyone to fear, in robbing us of knowledge, but the might of our own minds? Who is it that will sacrifice and labour and build and struggle till we have grasped and mastered our intellectual heritage? Ourselves. Ourselves. Always ourselves. Because we know and with all our might will demonstrate the truth that knowledge is more precious than rubies, we cannot be effectively deprived of it. At whatever sacrifice, we shall insist upon it. We shall give our very lives for it. We must have knowledge, at all costs. We must be educated men. As a nation, we must lead the culture of the world. In days when that culture was classical, literary, and psychological or mathematical, we led it. Now that it is scientific, with side-issues in mechanical application; we must again lead it. We shall never be content with even a second place in these things. The whole history of the world shows that the Indian intellect is second to none. This must be proved, by the performance of a task beyond the power of others, the seizing of the first place in the intellectual advance of the world. Is there any inherent weakness that would make it impossible for us to do this? Are the countrymen of Bashkaracharya and Sankaracharya inferior to the countrymen of Newton and Darwin? We trow not. It is for us, by the power of our thought, to break down the iron walls of opposition that confront us, and to seize and enjoy the intellectual sovereignty of the world.

THE WORK STILL POSSIBLE.

Many people feel that the rapid succession of suppressive enactments which we have lately seen, has made all open and public work for nationality impossible. Between the easy acquiescence of a government servant and the secret activity of the terrorist, they see no possible middle course left. The laborious path of political struggle, which was chalked out by our Moderate patriots in the early eighties, under the honest illusion that it might lead somewhere, has been obliterated before our eyes. A political party can only exist, so long as it is possible for it to proclaim an aggressive policy, which can attract public faith. When such a policy is rendered absurd, the party perishes, because it can no longer command the popular enthusiasm necessary to its existence. In this sense, Moderatism is dead amongst us. No one can any longer believe in the possibility of the aims it proposes. It has overdrawn its account, or the balance has been confiscated, as we may like to put it, and it stands bankrupt of belief.

Now Moderatism was chiefly valuable, because it represented the only form of political activity possible to us under present circumstances. To say that the idea is dead, is tantamount to saying that the path of politics is closed, and "No Thoroughfare" written up large, at the entrance. We must be content henceforth with that political development which we had already reached. Fortunately, that was a good deal. Anyone who studies the history of the Congress is surprised at the way in which the parliamentary idea seems to have sprung into our midst, full-grown from the brain of the infinite. The experience of twenty-five years has neither added to it, nor taken away. The explanation of this fact, lies of course, in the democratic modes of conference which are in vogue in the undivided family, the village, and the caste. Viewed in this connection, the history of the Congress furnishes a very valuable object-lesson in our own efficiency, and we cannot afford, as a people, to despise anything that is capable of feeding our courage.

But now that all activity is forbidden to our poor friends, is there any political activity left, that we may practise for our country? Or are terrorists the only people whose activities can continue unabated? It is a grave question. But let us ask, Was the constructive work ever political? No Moderate ever yet, at a Budget Debate, had the courage to get up and move a vote for a prohibitive tax on imported cotton goods, much less get such a motion passed. A graceful programme of concessions theoretically possible, is after all, only a castle in the air. Was the Moderate platform ever anything more than this? At best, it was the mock warfare by which, in time of peace, an army keeps itself in training. What work more than this did Moderate politics ever accomplish? Was it the Congress that opened the eyes of the people to the needs of the age? Was it Moderate journals that educated us to stand by ourselves, and seek within ourselves the sources of our strength? It must be admitted that these always lagged behind public opinion; that the Congress never wholly expressed the heart of the people; that the newspapers, admirably as they have sometimes assisted, have never at any time played a leading or formative part in our evolution. Is it not almost a kindness, to snatch from the cripple the crutch on which he leans, if we see that it is weak and faulty, and may lead him to disaster?

Meetings prohibited, papers suppressed, comrades under arrest, is the cause of the nationalist and his organisation therefore dead? By no means! That cause was born of a THOUGHT, and that thought has come to us to stay. We know now that it is the shaping and compelling shadow of the I that accompanies thought, that gives to it its individuality and power. A tree may be conscious, vaguely, of moon and sun, of heat and cold, of water and thirst, but we have not yet imagined that the tree can realise itself, and so convert its knowledge into will. The cat has a certain power of thought. Its sensations are in some respects keener than those of human beings. But they only extend to a certain limited height in scale of dignity. Taste, smell, hearing, are only important to the cat, as they stand related to certain of the lower and grosser needs. Worlds upon worlds of higher things may come and go around her, and she may talk, or councils be held at which thrones change hands, yet puss remains indifferent, serenely absorbed in the catching of a mouse! To all the higher and finer stimuli, she is indifferent; her mind takes no account of them. She has no power to act upon them. The words of an apostle fall upon her ears. But to her they are no more than the sound of the voice of a jhee screaming at her neighhours. She hears. She knows the difference between sound and silence. And that is all. She feels a kick, and fears it. She feels caresses, and seeks them. But she has no power of mind, to generalise these experiences, or to go behind them, and reason about why and wherefore, much less to take steps for obtaining the mastery over both kinds of bondage.

It is quite possible for a nation to live in the midst of things that concern it, just, like a cat in a circle of apostles. Events come and go. Sensations occur and pass. But the national response is no more than a twitch of dissatisfaction, or a purr of content. The twitch may take the form of speeches and articles, it may even go so far as the organisation of pulaver-sabhas and protest-newspapers. But if it ends there, nothing much has been accomplished. Let the sabhas and the newspapers all be suppressed, and pussy is very little richer or poorer. It is not here that her power is lodged. No, for that, we have to turn to the national mind. Has that realised itself? In any sense or degree. It is not necessary to become an Avatar, in order to act with common-sense. It is not necessary to reach mukti before we attempt to be a little manly. The selfishness of egoism is the beginning of a knowledge of the atman. The Indian people have begun to understand that there is a place in the world called India. Let them go on to understand this more and more deeply. Here, in the Indian mind, is the true field of work. The deepening of the national consciousness is the whole of the constructive programme. Does any man mean to tell us that this depends on the existence of licensed and tabulated organs? Nonsense! The lopping-off of a limb may actually deepen a man's consciousness of himself, by forcing him to think deeper, and to circumvent destiny. "Fundamental brain-work" is the one thing that saves nations, and stamps the rank of their actions, even as it does their productions. Wherever this fundamental brain-work can go on intensifying the idea of India, the Indian people, Indian duties, and Indian rights, there real work is going forward, whoever may think to the contrary.

Of this work, every movement, of every person, in every part of the country, will form a part. No word that is spoken, by mother to babe, by master to workman, by customers to shopkeeper, but will carry a winged message. Every person becomes, to the thinker, a symbol of the Great Mother. Everything will minister to Her worship. That which is aimed against Her will deepen our reverence, while that which speaks in her favour will express and re-echo it. Mistakes will scourge and taunt and torture this national sense into being. Acts of friendship and amity will build it up in harmony and concord. Nothing will foster it more rapidly than attention drawn to the prohibition of education. This will make it defiant, menacing, difficult to control and guide. Yet education also will be its minister and handmaiden. And wherever we see the growth of the national idea, let us learn to think that we see work going forward, a work that can never cease to be possible. Let men but meet; when the moment comes, the mass will fuse. Let us but think: when the hour strikes, we cannot fail to act.

PAPERS ON NATIONAL EDUCATION. NATION-MAKING.

Education in India to-day, has to be not only national, but nation-making. We have seen what a national education is—a training which has a strong colour of its own, and begins by relating the child to his home and country, through all that is familiar, but ends by making him free of all that is true, cosmopolitan, and universal. This is the necessary condition of all healthy education, in all countries, whatever their political position or stage of development. These general statements are as true of England or France, as of India, as true in happiness as in adversity.

The need for special attention to nation-making, however, is a question of the moment, a matter of those temporary vicissitudes through which a country may be passing, in a given period. It is always easy, by common consent of responsible persons, or by the sound communal instincts of a healthy people, to select out and emphasise, for a definite purpose, any elements in a general education that may be thought desirable. All our institutions have arisen in some such way. The need of purity was first brought forward, in our customs, at some time when loss of civilisation was a pressing danger. The regulation of marriage was a device deliberately intended to prevent mixture of race, in a period that had to face this as a possibility. Similarly, a people who need above all things the development of a national sense, can make special provision for developing the necessary elements of thought and character, throughout the education of their children.

National feeling is, above all, feeling for others. It is rooted in public spirit, in a strong civic sense. But these are only grandiloquent names for what may be described as organised unselfishness. The best preparation for nation-making that a child can receive is to see his elders always eager to consider the general good, rather than their own. A family that willingly sacrifices its own interests to those of the village, or the street, or the town, household that condones no act of dishonesty on the part of public servants, out of consideration for its own comfort or safety; a father who will fling himself at any obstacle, in the cause of honour and justice for the people, these are the best and strongest education for nation-making that a child can have. The wild-boar, small as he is, throws himself upon the horse and his rider, never doubting his own capacity to destroy both. This is the courage of the man who attacks public evils. This is the object-lesson by which a child can best be trained. Hunger for the good of others, as an end in itself, the infinite pity that wakes in the heart of an Avatar, at sight of the suffering of humanity, these are the seed and root of nation-making. We are a nation, when every man is an organ of the whole, when every part of the whole is precious to us; when the family weighs nothing, in comparison with the People.

China in Asia, and France in Europe, are the two countries that have best known how to make the public spirit into religion. This is the fact that made Joan of Arc a possibility. A peasant-girl in a remote village could brood over the sorrows of her country, till she was possessed by the feeling that there was match pity in Heaven for the fair realm of France." An idea like this was like the compassion of a Buddha, and nowhere but in France could it have been applied to the country.

We must surround our children with the thought of their nation and their country. The centre of gravity must lie, for them, outside the family. We must demand from them sacrifices for India, bhakti for India, learning for India. The ideal for its own sake. India for the sake of India. This must be as the breath of life to them. We must teach them about India, in school and at home. Some lessons must fill out the conception: others must build up the sense of contrast. Burning love, love without a limit. Love that seeks only the good of the beloved, and has no thought of self, this is the passion that we must demand of them.

We must teach them to think heroically. They must be brought up to believe in their own people. Few stories are so moving as that of two English youths who were killed by an angry mob in the Punjab, dying with the words on their lips, "We are not the last of the English!" Similarly we must learn to draw every breath in the proud conviction, "We are not the last of the Indians!" This faith our children must inherit from us, along with all other forms of stern and heroic thought. It is a mistake to think heroes are born. Nothing of the sort. They are made, not born; made by the pressure of heroic thought. All human beings long at bottom for self-sacrifice. No other thirst is so deep as this. We desire destruction, not prosperity, and the good of others.

Let us recognise this. Let us make room for it. Let us emphasize it, and direct it towards one single bhakti. Let love for country and countrymen, for People and Soil, be the mould into which our lives flow hot. If we reach this, every thought we think, every word of knowledge gained, will aid in making clearer and clearer the great picture. With faith in the Mother, and bhakti for India, the true interpretation of facts will come to us unsought. We shall see the country as united, where we were told that she was fragmentary. Thinking her united, she will actually be so. The universe is the creation of mind, not matter. And can anyone force in the world resist a single thought, held with intensity by three hundred millions of people? Here we have the true course of a nation-making education.

PAPERS ON NATIONAL EDUCATION. THE EDUCATION OF THE HEART.

The reconstitution of a nation has to begin with its ideals. This, because in a nation three primary elements have to be considered, first the country, or region, second, the people, and third, the national mind. Of the three, the last is dominant and all-directing. By working through it, we may modify or even re-create either or both of the other two while their influence upon it is comparatively feeble and indirect. Mind can remake any thing, however inert or rebellious, but a rebellious mind, what can reach? It follows that in national reconstitution there is no other factor so important as education. How is this to be made national and nationalising? What is a national education? And conversely what is un-national? And further what kind of education offers the best preparation for the attempt to solve the national problems? What type of education would be not only national, but also nation-making?

Education has to deal with various factors, the imparting of special processes, the assimilating of certain kinds and quantities of knowledge, the development of the man himself. Of all these it is the last which is incomparably the most important, and in the man, it is again his ideals which form the critical element. It is useless to attempt to teach a man anything which he does not desire to learn. It is absurd to try to force on him an advantage which he resists. Education is like mining. It begins with the ideal, it builds first at the top.

New ideals have to be approached through the old. The unfamiliar has to be reached through the familiar. It may indeed be questioned whether there is such a thing as a new ideal. There is an ideal and there is a form through which it is expressed, but when we reach the ideal itself, we have reached the eternal. Here, all humanity is at one. Here, there is neither new nor old, neither own nor foreign. The limiting forms are some old, some new: but the ideal itself knows nothing of time. Yet the expression 'new ideals' has a certain meaning. European poetry, for instance, glorifies and exalts the betrothed maiden. Indian poetry equally idealises the faithful wife. Both are only customary forms through which is reached the supreme conception, that of holiness in woman. Obviously, however, it would be futile to try to lead the imagination of an Indian child to this ideal, through the characteristically European conception, and equally foolish to try to lead the European child through the prevailing Indian form. Yet, when education has done its perfect work, in the emancipation of the imagination towards great and gracious womanhood, it is clear that there will be an instant apprehension of this ideal, even in new forms. The poetry of Tennyson and Browning will at once be understood at its highest and best, by the trained and developed heart and yet it would have been a crime to try to bring up the Indian child on it. Equal would be the folly of trying to educate the European child on Sita and Savitri instead of Beatrice and Joan of Arc, although the same child when grown up, may well test the depth of its own culture by its instant sympathy with the Eastern heroines.

A national education is, first and foremost, an education in the national idealism. We must remember however that the aim of education is emancipation of sympathy and intellect. This is not often reached by foreign methods. But in the exceptional cases of a few individuals it may seem to occur: and better emancipation through the foreign, than bondage through our own. By this fact of the attainment of the universal,—must the education ultimately stand justified or condemned. To emancipate the greatest number of people most easily and effectively, it is necessary to choose familiar ideals and forms, and in every case, it is necessary to make progression absolutely continuous, so that there be no sharp incongruity amongst the elements of early experience. Such incongruity begets confusion of thought, and this confusion is educational chaos. A national education then, must be made up of familiar elements. The ideal presented must always be first clothed in a form evolved by our own past. Our imagination must be first based on our own heroic literature. Our hope must be woven out of our history. From the known to the unknown, from the easy to the difficult, must be the motto of every teacher, the rule of every lesson. The familiar is not the goal; knowledge is the goal: trained faculty is the aim. An education that stopped short at the familiar would be a bondage instead of an emancipation; a mockery not a reality. The familiar is merely the first step. But as the first step, it is essential.

Geographical ideas must be built up first through the ideas of India. But they must not stop there. A knowledge of geography would be singularly rustic if it did not include a clear concept of the world, as a whole. And even this is not sufficient. There must, in a complete education, be a release of the geographical faculty, an initiation into geographical enquiry, an inception of geographical research.

Similarly of history. The sense of historic sequence must be trained through India. To that, every thing else historical must stand related. But the history of India must be only a stepping-stone to constantly-widening circles of knowledge. The history of Mongolian, Semitic, European and African peoples; their civilizations and their movements, must all be followed up. And the crown of this training will be found in the power to interpret anew the old facts, to perceive fresh significance, and unthought-of sequences, and to gather from the story of the past the dynamic forces of the future.

So much for a historical education. It must never be forgotten that nationality in culture is the means, not the end. There is a level of achievement where all the educated persons of the world can meet, understand and enjoy each other's associations. This level is freedom. Intellectually speaking, it is mukti. But it can be reached only by him whose knowledge is firm-rooted in love for mother and mother-land, in tender memories of childhood and the early struggle after knowledge, and in an unshakable assurance that the face of God shines brightest and His name sounds sweetest, in the village of his birth.

A SYSTEM OF NATIONAL EDUCATION.

THE TRAINING OF THE MIND. THE OBSTRUCTION OF THE SENSES. CHAPTER V.

There are six senses which minister to knowledge, sight, hearing, smell, touch and taste, mind, and all of these except the last, look outward and gather the material of thought from outside through the physical nerves and their end-organs, eye, ear, nose, skin, palate. The perfection of the senses as ministers to thought must be one of the first cares of the teachers. The two things that are needed of the senses are accuracy and sensitiveness. We must first understand what are the obstacles to the accuracy and sensitiveness of the senses, in order that we may take the best steps to remove them.

The cause of imperfection must be understood by those who desire to bring about perfection.

The senses depend for their accuracy and sensitiveness on the unobstructed activity of the nerves which are the channels of their information and the passive acceptance of the mind which is the recipient. In themselves the organs do their work perfectly. The eye gives the right form, the ear the correct sound, the palate the right taste, the skin the right touch, the nose the right smell. This can easily be understood if we study the action of the eye as a crucial example. A correct image is reproduced automatically on the retina, if there is any error in appreciating it, it is not the fault of the organ, but of something else.

The fault may be with the nerve currents. The nerves are nothing but channels, they have no power in themselves to alter the information given by the organs. But a channel may be obstructed and the obstruction may interfere either with the fullness or the accuracy of the information, not as it reaches the organ where it is necessarily and automatically perfect, but as it reaches the mind. The only exception is in case of a physical defect in the organ as an instrument. That is not a matter for the educationist, but for the physician.

If the obstruction is such as to stop the information reaching the mind at all, the result is an insufficient sensitiveness of the senses. The defects of sight; hearing; smell, touch, taste, and anesthesia in its various degrees, are curable when not the effect of physical injury or defect in the organ itself. The obstructions can be removed and the sensitiveness remedied by the purification of the nerve system. The remedy is a simple one which is now becoming more and more popular in Europe for different reasons and objects, the regulation of the breathing. This process inevitably restores the perfect and unobstructed activity of the channels and, if well and thoroughly done, leads to a high activity of the senses. The process is called in Yogic discipline, nadi-suddhi, or nerve purification.

The obstruction in the channel may be such as not absolutely to stop in however small a degree, but to distort the information. A familiar instance of this is the effect of fear or alarm on the sense action. The startled horse takes the sack on the road for a dangerous living thing, the startled man takes a rope for a snake, a waving curtain for a ghostly form. All distortions due to actions in the nervous system can be traced to some kind of emotional disturbance acting in the nerve channels. The only remedy for them is the habit of calm, the habitual steadiness of the nerves. This also can be brought about by nadi-suddhi or nerve-purification, which quiets the system, gives a deliberate calmness to all the internal processes and prepares the purification of the mind.

If the nerve channels are quiet and clear, the only possible disturbance of the information is from or through the mind. Now the manas or sixth sense is in itself a channel like the nerves, a channel for communication with the buddhi or brain-force. Disturbance may happen either from above or from below. The information from outside is first photographed on the end organ, then reproduced at the other end of the nerve system in the chitta or passive memory. All the images of sight, sound, smell, touch and taste are deposited there and the manas reports them to the buddhi. The manas is both a sense organ and a channel. As a sense organ it is as automatically perfect as the others, as a channel it is subject to disturbance resulting either in obstruction or distortion.

As a sense organ the mind receives direct thought impressions from outside and from within. These impressions are in themselves perfectly correct, but in their report to the intellect they may either not reach the intellect at all or may reach it so distorted as to make a false or partially false impression. The disturbance may effect the impression which attains the information of the eye, ear, nose, skin or palate, but it is very slightly powerful here, in its effect on the direct impressions of the mind, it is extremely powerful and the chief source of error. The mind takes direct impressions primarily of thought, but also of form, sound, indeed of all the things for which it usually prefers to depend on the sense organs. The full development of this sensitiveness of the mind is called in our Yogic discipline Sukshmadrishti or subtle reception of images. Telepathy, clairvoyance, clairaudience, presentment, thought-reading, character-reading and many other modern discoveries are very ancient powers of the mind which have been left undeveloped, and they all belong to the manas. The development of the sixth sense has never formed part of human training. In a future age it will undoubtedly take a place in the necessary preliminary training of the human instrument. Meanwhile there is no reason why the mind should not be trained to give a correct report to the intellect so that our thought may start with absolutely correct if not with full impressions.

The first obstacle, the nervous emotional, we may suppose to be removed by the purification of the nervous system. The second obstacle is that of the emotions themselves warping the impression as it comes. Love may do this, hatred may do this, any emotion or desire according to its power and intensity may distort the impression as it travels. This difficulty can only be removed by the discipline of the emotions, the purifying of the moral habits. This is a part of moral training and its consideration may be postponed for the moment. The next difficulty is the interference of previous associations, formed or ingrained in the chitta or passive memory. We have a habitual way of looking at things and the conservative inertia in our nature disposes us to give every new experience the shape and semblance of those to which we are accustomed. It is only more developed minds which can receive first impressions without an unconscious bias against the novelty of novel experience. For instance, if we get a true impression of what is happening—and we habitually act on such impressions true or false—if it differs from what we are accustomed to expect, the old association meets it in the chitta and sends a changed report to the intellect in which either the new impression is overlaid and concealed by the old or mingled with it. To go farther into this subject, would be to involve ourselves too deeply into the details of psychology. This typical instance will suffice. To get rid of this obstacle is impossible without chittasuddhi or purification of the mind and mental moral habits formed in the chitta. This is a preliminary process of Yoga and was effected in our ancient system by various means, but would be considered out of place in a modern system of education.

It is clear, therefore, that unless we revert to our old Indian system in some of its principles, we must be content to allow this source of disturbance to remain. A really national system of education would not allow itself to be controlled by European ideas in this all important matter. And there is a process so simple and momentous that it can easily be made a part of our system.

It consists in bringing about passivity of the restless flood of thought sensations rising of its own momentum from the passive memory independent of our will and control. This passivity liberates the intellect from the siege of old associations and false impressions. It gives it power to select only what is wanted from the storehouse of the passive memory, automatically brings about the habit of getting right impressions and enables the intellect to dictate to the chitta what sanskaras or associations shall be formed or rejected. This is the real office of the intellect,—to discriminate, choose, select, arrange. But so long as there is not chitta suddhi, instead of doing this office perfectly, it itself remains imperfect and corrupt and adds to the confusion in the mind channel by false judgment, false imagination, false memory, false observation, false comparison, contrast and analogy, false deduction, induction and inference. The purification of the chitta is essential for the liberation, purification and perfect action of the intellect.

A DAILY ASPIRATION FOR THE NATIONALIST.

I believe that India is one, undissoluble, indivisible.

National unity is built on the common home, the common interest, and the common love.

I believe that the strength which spoke in the Vedas and Upanishads, in the making of religions and empires, in the learning of scholars, and the meditation of the saints, is born once more amongst us, and its name to-day is Nationality.

I believe that the present of India is deep-rooted in her past, and that before her shines a glorious future.

O Nationality, come thou to me as joy or sorrow, as honour or as shame! Make me thine own!

MR. HAVELL ON INDIAN ART.

A paper read before the Indian section of Royal society of arts. January 13th Sir George Birdwood in the chair.

Art still survives throughout the length and breadth of India as a part of a great traditional culture, intimately bound up with the religion and daily life of the great mass of the Indian people. In this traditional culture art still is as much a part of national life and education as it was in Europe from the dawn of civilization down to the eighteenth century. Opposed to this view of art as a part of religion, life, and work are two great exotic forces—Western commercialism, in which art is merely an instrument of wealth, and Western education, represented by Anglo-Indian schools and colleges, from which art and religion are almost totally excluded. To these may be added the principles of Anglo-Indian administration, in which art has hitherto been treated as it generally is in modern European life, only as a luxury and means of intellectual recreation or amusement.

THE SCHOOLS OF ART.

Art administration in India is now represented by four Government Schools of Art, which occupy an anomalous position totally isolated from the rest of the administrative machinery. They were originally instituted when Lord Macaulay's view of the worthlessness of all Indian culture governed the whole educational administration, with the intention of bringing, to the benighted East that which academic Europe still believes to be the higher artistic culture of Greece and Italy. But about thirty years ago, through the influence of Sir George Birdwood's writings, different views of artistic policy in India began to prevail at the India Office, and the Secretary of State has since repeatedly affirmed in despatches that the intention of the Schools of Art in India is not to force upon Indians European ideas of art, but to promote the development of Indian art and craft upon their traditional lines.

The ways and means of accomplishing this task may be a matter of opinion, but I do not think that any art teacher would now question the wisdom of the principle which has been thus laid down for the guidance of art schools in India. Every artist in Europe deploras the tendency of Oriental artists and craftsmen to imitate blindly the products of modern European commercialism, and when some years ago the Japanese Government sent a Commission to Europe for the purpose of ascertaining what methods of European art teaching could usefully be introduced into Japan, it received the unanimous advice from all the authorities it consulted, both here and on the Continent, to make the traditional art practice the basis of national art education. If this is the right artistic policy for Japan, it is right for India also, and I should imagine that no competent authority would now dispute that the same principle applies to art education in every country. But this clear conception of policy leaves the question of ways and means unanswered, and imposes upon Schools of Art in India a task which, under present circumstances, is totally beyond their power.

In the first place, before any European art expert can qualify himself for the task, he must for understanding the aims of Indian art learn a good deal of Indian art history, philosophy, religion and mythology; and to obtain this knowledge he must spend many years of study, research and travel. But the art expert, who is sent out to India with a despatch from the Secretary of State announcing his mission to promote the revival of Indian art, has his ardour for research considerably damped at the outset by finding that the principle laid down for his guidance is totally opposed to all the traditions of the department of which he is a very subordinate official, and to the settled policy of the great department of State which has the control of the design of public buildings. Even within the narrow limits of his jurisdiction he finds many, and great, difficulties to contend with. The schools are placed, not in the great centres of Indian art and industry, but at the principal seats of government, which are also the centres of Anglo-Indian university life and of European commerce. They are, therefore, quite out of touch with real Indian art, that is, the art which enters into the religion, life, and work of the great mass of the Indian people, outside the very small section known as the "educated" class, or those who have been taught in Anglo-Indian or European schools and colleges.

The great majority of the students who attend the Schools of Art are not properly speaking, art students; they are either drawn from the great artistic and industrial castes which number, roughly, some ten million craftsmen, representing Indian traditional art practice, nor are they, generally, students who have shown any special aptitude for artistic pursuits.

They are, for the most part, the floaters and jetsam of the Anglo-Indian university system—students who have either failed to obtain entrance into the university, or who have, for some reason or other been obliged to find some other means of livelihood than those which the university curriculum provides. Because the university excludes art from its scope, and for other reasons which I shall allude to further on, an artistic career in India holds out very small pecuniary inducements. There is only a very limited prospect of Government employment for successful students, and no Indian artist or craftsman has ever yet had any kind of distinction conferred upon him by our Government, though under native rule an artist's was a highly honourable occupation, which received due recognition from the State.

The very fact that the principalship of the Schools of Art has always been held by Europeans, adds to the difficulty of carrying out the policy laid down by the India Office. To send out art experts to India to teach Indian art seems very like sending coals to Newcastle, and it would be so, were it not that Indian art has fallen into such contempt with English-educated Indians that it has hitherto been almost impossible to find an Indian who is at the same time fully acquainted with Indian art tradition, and has sufficient knowledge of English to write departmental reports about it for the information of Government. The students of the art schools naturally expect a European principal to teach European art, and one of the greatest difficulties I had to contend with for many years was the opposition of students and their parents to what seemed to them the retrograde and inconsistent policy of making Indian art the foundation of the entire curriculum of the school. They were willing to accept the proposition that Indian art should be taught in the lower classes, or on what is called the industrial side of the school, but the ambition of every student was to become eventually a portrait painter or sculptor, and obtain prizes at the Simla Fine Arts Exhibition—the Royal Academy of Anglo-India. As a rule, students could only be bribed to remain in the industrial side by scholarships and the prospect of Government employment.

THE TEACHING OF THE FINE ARTS.

The theory that Indian art is only admirable when applied to industrial purposes, and barbaric, or undeveloped, in the higher flights of artistic expression, which we call the "fine arts," is really at the root of an art teacher's difficulties in India, for as long as this proposition is maintained as the basis of educational policy it is wholly illogical and useless to attempt to teach Indian art at all. It is logical to teach, as Indian schools of art did teach for the first twenty-five years of their existence, that all Indian art is inferior, and that educated Indians should borrow all their artistic ideas from Europe. But it is hopelessly illogical to teach, as we have been teaching for the last twenty-five years, and are still teaching, that Indian applied art is admirable and Indian fine art barbaric. It is utterly useless to expect educated and highly intelligent Indians to draw a distinction between Indian art in its industrial applications and Indian art as applied to sculpture, painting, and architecture. The distinction is purely artificial and academic, and cannot be maintained as a working principle in teaching. If educated Indians accept our teaching that Europe has always excelled Asia in painting, sculpture and architecture, we cannot expect them to share the admiration we reserve for Oriental textiles, pottery, or jewellery.

There are technical considerations which make differences between artistic methods in a carpet, a mosaic, and a fresco painting, but all art is one, and both in Europe and in Asia the æsthetic philosophy which controls the weaver's fingers is the same as that which controls the painter's brushes and the sculptor's chisel. No school of æsthetic thought has ever propounded one philosophy for the carpet weaver, and another for the picture painter and sculptor. Indian art must stand or fall as a complete school of æsthetic philosophy: to maintain as an educational principle that the lower department of it has been successful and the higher a failure is to condemn all Indian art in the eyes of Indians who are capable of forming a considered and reasonable judgment for themselves.

THE MADRAS SCHOOL OF ART.

In Madras School of Art, when I took charge of it in 1884, the system of teaching was, like all other Indian Schools of Art at that time, based upon this illogical reasoning, that while Indian craft must be preserved, Indian fine art was not worth preserving. Indian ideas of design were, to a certain extent, encouraged on the craft side of the School, but in the drawing classes, which all the students attended, Indian art was tabooed, and the usual examples of a South Kensington School of Art—the casts from the antique, the drawing-copies, &c.—were placed before them, and a collection of European paintings belonging to the Madras Fine Arts Society was hung in the picture gallery. Not a single example of the best Indian painting or sculpture was to be found in the school. The natural effect of this system was that even those students who were bribed to work as craftsmen by payments in the shape of Government scholarships took no real interest in their work. Public opinion among educated Indians, as well as among most Anglo-Indians, condemned all Indian art as inferior, so the highest ambition of every student was to learn as much as possible of European art, or rather to imitate as faithfully as possible the European examples which the school provided. I found on my arrival a pupil-teacher, on the school staff, whose father was one of the most skilful goldsmiths in Madras, diligently engaged in making shaded drawings from the antique in the most approved South Kensington fashion, and his great pride was, not that he was himself a good goldsmith, but that he had won prizes at the Madras Fine Arts Exhibition for still-life painting in oil.

* I found one student in Madras who had been drawing a State scholarship for 17 years. Probably he considered he was qualifying for an old age pension.

Though I was strongly convinced at that time, without any deep study of Indian art, that the system was fundamentally unsound, it was not easy for a young official, in a very subordinate position in the educational service, to reverse entirely the policy of his predecessors in the face of a strong public and official opinion, and but for the sympathy and encouragement of the then Governor of Madras, Sir Mountsart Elphinstone Grant Duff, I should have given up the attempt in despair at the beginning of my official career. As it was, I was compelled to make some compromise. The Madras Fine Arts Society removed its pictures from the Art Gallery; Indian examples were introduced throughout the school, both in the workshops and in the drawing classes; the "antique" casts were undisturbed, but were not used in the drawing classes except by a very few students, mostly Europeans, who paid higher fees to learn picture painting and sculpture. I must congratulate Mr. Hadaway, the present Principal, on having got rid of them altogether, and I am glad to hear that he is carrying out further reforms, which I was not able to accomplish in teaching during the time I was in charge.

THE CALCUTTA SCHOOL OF ART.

In the Madras School of Art the question of the teaching of the fine arts did not become a pressing one, because the school was essentially a craft school; and with the help of some very excellent Indian craftsmen as teachers, and by offering inducements to the sons of craftsmen, it was possible to maintain Indian traditions in the workshops both with regard to drawing and design. But when I came to take charge of the Calcutta School of Art in 1890 I found that the question could not be shelved. The conditions were much more hopeless than they were in Madras. The organisation and equipment of the school was entirely that of a fourth-rate provincial art school in England thirty years ago. The methods of teaching and the examples were precisely the same. In Madras a fair proportion of students belonged to the castes of traditional handicraft, but in Calcutta the students were for the most part sons of Bengali teachers, clerks, and most landed proprietors, who either from want of means, or other reasons, had no prospect of Government employment through a university career. A considerable section of the best students joined only for the purpose of learning picture painting, and, as not a single student belonged to the artisan castes, it was impossible for me to do as I did in Madras—maintain the school as a craft school only. It was equally impossible to carry out the instructions of the Secretary of State to make Indian art the basis of the teaching, when the students had no access to good Indian examples. As in Madras, the art gallery attached to the school contained only European pictures, a collection much inferior to that of many small provincial towns in England, but it was not so easy to reverse the policy of my predecessors in this case, as it was a Government collection which had been inaugurated under Viceregal patronage. After some difficulty I obtained the consent of the committee of the gallery to commence an Indian section; but it was not until a good many years afterwards, when the latter was well established and contained many striking original examples of Indian paintings, bronzes, &c., that I ventured to ask Government to provide sufficient funds for extending the Indian section by selling the collection of European pictures. When the latter were finally put up for sale a considerable outcry was raised in the Bengali press because it was said that through ignorance and incapacity as a teacher of European art I was lowering the standard of the school. In the school itself I met with a storm of opposition from the students, who were secretly supported by some members of the staff trained on old system. At one time only one student was left on the school benches while the rest were holding mass meetings in the maidan outside. Some of the ex-students combined with these rebels to open an opposition establishment, paradoxically called "the Indian Art School," so that such knowledge of the European methods as they possessed should not be lost to the citizens of Calcutta by my reactionary policy. Such proceedings may seem to be very ludicrous and unreasonable, but are easy to understand when it is considered that very few Bengalis in Calcutta had ever had an opportunity of seeing any good specimens of indigenous art, and that for generations all art students and English educated Indians had been taught to believe that Indian art was only a relic of a semibarbarous age.

FIRST EFFECT OF THE NEW POLICY IN ART-TEACHING.

An educational policy, however plausible it may seem in theory, must always be justified by results, and in this respect the new departure I ventured to make in the teaching of fine art in Calcutta has more than fulfilled my most sanguine expectation. For fifty years the Indian Schools of Art, under the old European system of teaching, had not produced a teacher qualified to take entire charge of one of them, and hardly a single original painter of conspicuous ability, judged by modern European standards. The effect of the new system of taking students back to their own national traditions was as astonishing as that of the first downpour of the monsoon rains upon the parched vegetation of the sun-baked Indian soil. The collection of Indian paintings which I started in the Calcutta Art Gallery immediately attracted the attention of a highly gifted art student, Mr. Abanindro Nath Tagore, whose name as an original artist and the founder of the new school of Indian painting, is now well-known to artists both in Europe and Japan through reproductions in "The Studio" and in "The Kokka." This collection was as much a revelation to him as it was to myself, and has been to other European artists who have seen it. It changed entirely the direction of his artistic studies from the usual academic routine of Europe which had had such a deadening influence upon the originality of all Indian art students up to that time. When some years afterwards, I was fortunate enough to secure his co-operation in the school work, he quickly drew round him a small band of pupils whose brilliant work in an astonishingly short time has compelled the attention of the Anglo-Indian and Indian public.

This new school, founded on a revival of Indian traditions of painting and sculpture, will, I am convinced, have a far-reaching influence which will not be confined to the fine arts. It is a school of idealist, for otherwise it would not be Indian. The idealist popularly supposed to be an unpractical person and in our Indian administration is generally regarded with grave suspicion. Yet I would venture to maintain that most of the unnecessary difficulties which we have created for ourselves in India have been those of the practical man ignorantly trampling on Indian ideals. It certainly has been the practical men who are responsible for all the injury which we have done to Indian art and craft in the last fifty years. It is the practical men who have vainly tried in India to detach the fine arts from the industrial arts, believing that we can impose upon India European ideals in the former without destroying all Indian tradition in the latter. It is the practical men who, in the name of scientific progress, have helped to ruin Indian handicrafts, and still continue to be so, in spite of the lessons they might learn from the industrial history of modern Europe.

INDIAN HANDICRAFTS.

Indian handicraft means, economically, for India by far the most important factor in the sum total of her present existing industry, after agriculture. It is impossible to give exact figures, because official statistics of Indian industry have hitherto ignored this vital fact, and have given very few precise particulars of industry in India except of that created by European commercialism. But it is nevertheless a fact that the sum total of the output of all European industry in India represents a smaller economic asset than that of the greatest of Indian handicrafts—hand-loom weaving.

Handicraft is still the backbone of the Indian industrial organisation, and, as Sir George Birdwood said in the discussion which followed Mr. Cecil Burn's paper, read before this Society last May, "the Indian craftsmen to this day are intrinsically, in every respect, capable of sustaining their reputation of the past in its greatest periods, to its highest pitch." The statement of the Principal of the Bombay School of Art that the ancient handicraft of India is as dead as that of the Greeks, or as that of the Renaissance in Europe, may seem to be an emphatic contradiction to this assertion. Yet it may be accepted as almost literal truth, so far as the British administration of India is concerned. Except for the work of a few Schools of Art, where, as Sir George Birdwood truly observe, "they have been from time to time degraded from their higher objects, and debased to the status of commercial factories, for the purpose of providing an income out of the penurious pockets of the globe-trotter in part payment of the cost of their maintenance by the State," and except for occasional spasmodic and unorganised efforts to display Indian handicraft in local and international exhibitions, the British administration has always regarded Indian handicraft as dead and buried. The work done inside the Indian Schools of Art has not yet touched the edge of Indian industry, and can never do so, under their present organisation. The best craftwork ever produced in an Indian art school has only rarely equalled, and never excelled, the best which can be and is still being produced by the handicrafts men who remain entirely outside the influence of our modern educational schemes.

THE INFLUENCE OF MUSALMAN ART ON THE ARTS OF WESTERN EUROPE.*

Oriental influence on the arts of the west, especially well-established in the case of architectural monuments, long ago became an archaeological axiom. But all who have referred to it have thought chiefly of the Byzantine influence.

We do not need to consider this question (here), and putting aside all the oriental influences which have reached us through Byzantine art and that indirect route, we shall limit our discussion to the forms of definitely Musalman character met with in our art, and by this line of study alone, we shall find it possible to define the influences directly felt.

Seen from this point of view, the question is rather novel. Suspected vaguely by Viollet le Duc, apprehended to a limited extent by Emeric David, Merimee and by De Coumond, almost established, by Longperier, outlined by Courajob, it has only been recently made the subject of precise statements and general conclusions, thanks to the excellent work M. Emile Bertaux on the monuments of Central Italy, and to the two chapters so full of facts and ideas which Jean Marquet de Vasselot has devoted to it in the General History of Art edited by Andre Michel.

The artistic influence of Islam made itself felt in Europe from the commencement of its supremacy in the East Mediterranean area. From Carolingian times, Arab barques had ventured west as far as the Atlantic, and the most remote countries in the Western world seem to have henceforward made their contribution to Musalman trade. Coins of the Ommyads (i.e. of the second half of the seventh century) have been found not only in Russia and Poland, but even as far as Denmark and Sweden. It seems evident, though the rarity of examples rather diminished the strength of the argument, that many objects of sumptuary art used in Europe had an Oriental origin.

One of the first decorative motifs which the West borrowed from the East of the Aom or scared tree, an object of worship, symbol of immortality and future life, which we find amongst the Assyrians and Sassanian Persians rarely represented by itself, more often flanked by animals 'affronted' or 'back to back', as in the mosaics of Germigny des Pres, Lothair's Gospel and Charles the Bald's Bible in the National Library, and the capital in the crypt of Saint-Laurent of Grenoble. Very often, the Western artist, not understanding it, has perceptibly altered the original motif, either by making a simple palmette of it, or by placing it between a hare and a pursuing archer, showing thus his ignorance of the former law of symmetry. The struggle of two animals,—almost always one above the other,—appears already on rare examples such as the ivory plaque of Tutilo, in the treasure of St. Gall or the reliquary of Gellone; as well as the conventional flower transmitted by the Assyrians to the Persians, and by them to the Byzantines in the mosaic of Germigny des Pres.

These Musalman influences, clear though rather rare in the early middle ages, become insistent and numerous in the Romanesque period: (1) owing to the continued arrival of Eastern work, (2) because of the increasing facility with which the Western craftsmen assimilated them.

The decorative motifs which entered into Western arts in the Romanesque period are still (forms of) the hom or tree of life, recognizable in many Romanesque capitals, usually flanked by affronted animals in the miniatures and textiles. When they did not understand the motif properly, Western artists sometimes suppressed it and directly affronted the animals, or set them back to back.

The fire altar or pyre, such as we meet with in the cope of St. Etienne of Chinon, or on St. Bertrand's winding sheet at the church of La Couture de Mans is not clearly recognizable in any monument of the Romanesque period.

A common motif on certain Musalman textiles is that of an animal having two heads attached to one body. It is met with on many Romanesque capitals, in the Museum at Beauvais, at St. Gildas of Ruy, at Moissac, at Angoulême, at San Ambrogio in Milan, and in manuscripts.

The animals devouring each other in Romanesque art are derived from two sources: Western barbaric art which represents them linked in rows, biting each other, or devised in knots: and the Musalman art which represents them mounted upon each other in isolated groups. It is in this way that the motif appears in the capitals of Notre-Dame du t'y, of Sainte-Eutrope at Saintes, and in Saint Sever manuscript of the Apocalypse.

The eagle with wings displayed, in the textile fabric of Saint-Germain d' Auxerre, in certain Arabian rock-crystals, or some ivory coffers is found on capitals at Monenval, at Tracy le Val, Ronceray d' Angers, at Issoire, and on the enamel cases of the coffin of Saint-Foy at Conques. The two-headed eagle appears on the pinnacles of a pillar from Moissac, and on a capital in the Toulouse Museum.

Musalman art had impressed on the Sassanians (who had already treated it under Chosros II at Taghe Bostan), the griffin, a mythical beast, which adds the head and wings of a bird and the tail of a serpent to the body of a lion. We find this griffin in the capitals of Bayeux, Couture at Mans, Fontevault, Notre Dame du Port at Clermont, Moissac. The human-headed bird, another mythical monster, is met with in the churches of Mans, Fontiers, Aulnay, Saint Benoit (Vienna), Saint Anthony, and Saint Michael at Bayeux.

Quoted from the French of M. Gaston Migeon by A. K. Choudhary.

The elephant, (corresponding to the Indian chess pawn), which we see in the National Library, or on the winding sheet of Charlemagne at Aix-le-Chapelle, is met with in the capitals of Montereux of Poitiers, Aulnay, the Trinity of Caen, and in the German or Flemish chandeliers, where the animal bears a tower on its back.

As for the conventional flower, rare in Musalman art before the 12th century, and common after the 13th century, and adopted quite early by Byzantine artists it is very difficult to say if we owe it directly to Musalman art, or indirectly to Byzantine. We meet it continually in the Limousin champleve enamels.

There is also a special way of representing the leaf which the Musalmans borrowed perhaps from the Byzantines. The foliage has a common stem regularly curved, with symmetrical leaves on right and left, ornamenting the hollow of the curve; these leaves have one side smooth, the other with three or four teeth which correspond to the hollowing of the surface. J. Marquet de Vasselot, who has very cleverly analysed this motif cut on Musalman rock-crystals, or engraved on ivory elephants, has found it on bas-reliefs at Viviers, on capitals at the Trinity at Caen, at Aubin d' Angers, at Saint-Sernan at Bordeaux, and, in the Toulouse Museum.

The epigraphic element, employed without meaning, in a purely ornamental way played a rather large part in Romanesque decoration, as Longperier and Courajod have already shown. In the Saint-Sever manuscript of the Apocalypse, in the National Library the borders of the frontispiece present a very striking imitation of 11th century mural inscriptions. Longperier has compared them with the inscription on a mural tomb in adajor, dated 1045.

In the door-frame at Notre-Dame in Velay there appears an inscription in degenerate Cufi characters. The name, "Petrus Epi (scopus)" corresponds well enough with that of Bishop Peter II (1050-1073). Round the door of the church of La Voute (Chilac) (Haute-Loire), there likewise runs a decorated ribbon with ornament continually repeated, consisting only of deformed Cufic characters. Similar observations have been made in the capitals of the Toulouse Museum, St. Guilhem in the Desert, the door of the tomb of Bohemond (d. 1111) at Canossa, on the altar-piece of Klosterneuberg, and round neck of the beautiful Alpin Pyx in the Apollo Gallery at the Louvre.

Finally in some cases Western craftsmen have gone farther, and in their work have literally copied certain Oriental objects, as in some of the capitals at the cathedral of Chartres.

1, HOGALKURIA, Calcutta.

As M. Jean Martens has observed, when Western decorative artists take Oriental motifs, it is not their charge, nor their artistic value, but their extreme ornamental quality, which was suited to their incapacity for rendering the complexity of nature, and to the ease with which they imitated without understanding.

In Gothic times and until the Renaissance, it is easy to find still in many objects of Western industrial art, frequent traces of the influence which the decorative formulas of the Musalman, East exercised upon them. They are recognisable in many examples of copper casting known as Dimanderies, in the beautiful decorated silk textiles of the Italian workshops, and in the first efforts of Italian potters. This last matter has been especially studied by Mr. Wallis, who has very critically studied the artistic permeation produced in Italy through Amalfi, Pisa, Genoa and Venice, allowing the products of Oriental pottery to find a place in the Italian markets, to inspire archaic and savage pottery like those which Professor Argenti found in the trenches at Faenza, inspired by the engraved pottery of the Eastern shores of the Mediterranean, and to be used in architectural ornament. There have actually been found bowls or fragments of oriental pottery, enclosed in external church walls of the 13th and 14th century, whilst on the other hand the importation of pottery from Spain (a rebound of the Oriental influence) was so very extensive that the very word Majol derived from the name of Majorca, was at once adopted as the term for every kind of pottery, and the very workshops of Italy started from those productions of lustre earthenware to achieve those marvels which the workshops of Derita and Gubbio have produced as masterpieces for ever.

In the remarkable enquiry which M. Paul Bertaux has undertaken there readily amongst the monuments of Central Italy, every instance of perceptible Oriental influence is noted, on the tomb of Bohemond, Prince of Austria at Canosa, a tomb, with its cupola on the square plan of a funerary monument with door of bronze damascened with silver, seems quite in the Musalman style. At the church of Montevergine, where the sacerdotal chair is made of wooden panels carved with animal medallions, quite like Egyptian minivers: at Carsoli in the Abruzzi, where the door of a little church shows separate bands of sculpture in which Cufic characters are imitated; in the portal of the cathedral of Trani; in the pulpit of Bitonto; and in the culosters at Amalfi, (the same thing is to be observed).

These evidences of the influence of Oriental art can be traced even in much more modern times, in the 16th century, (even) when the insistent influence of classic antiquity eclipsed everything else, and in the 17th and 18th centuries when a new factor appeared, viz., the taste for eastern goods; and until the present day. Moreover, the last word in this matter has not been said, and it would be impossible to too strongly recommend the study of the arts of Islam to decorative artists and workmen. In the great beauty of its formulas, by its fancy, always kept in bounds by the most strict logical laws, by the glowing brilliancy of its colour there is no art which offers greater decorative richness and more sovereign harmony. It contains fruitful seeds which may if transplanted bring forth abundantly.

THE Cheap Edition of KARMAYOGIN.

The difficulty felt by many students and educated men of small means in buying the KARMAYOGIN at its ordinary price of two annas, has been so much pressed on our attention that we have found it necessary to bring out a cheaper edition at one anna a copy. It is not an easy thing in this country to establish a weekly review of this standard written in English, and it has therefore been necessary for us at the outset to place a price on the paper which should ensure its being self-supporting even with a limited circulation. The KARMAYOGIN, however, is now sufficiently successful to allow of a concession of this kind being made without financial injury. The subscribers to the superior edition will be compensated by the superior get-up and paper, while the cheaper edition will remove the grievance of the large number who have hitherto been debarred from reading the review by their scanty means.

PASSING THOUGHTS.

Ramakrishna Paramahansa.

The utsava of Ramakrishna Paramahansa is an event that annually stirs Calcutta to its depths. Year after year the number increases, of those who believe that the birth of the sage of Dukshinেশ্বর has been the critical event of the present age, in India. Some believe this, for one reason; others for another. The devotee sees in him the last of the Avatars. The historian sees the key-stone of the idea that constitutes Hinduism. The partisan feels that he satisfies all parties and conflicts with none. The philosopher finds him the living embodiment of the highest Vedanta. And even amongst the workers, there are some who derive from the spectacle of his birth, the faith that inspires and sanctions all their struggles.

What is a Nationalist?

For a nationalist may be described as one who believes that the light has already shone upon us. He is not waiting for someone to arrive, for God to remember His India, for the leader of the age and the heroes to be born. In the eyes of the nationalist, all this has been done for us already, and it remains with us to work out the trust laid upon us. We have every opportunity that a people ever had. We have nothing more to ask for, nothing more to wait for. Ours is only to love and work and suffer, and struggling to the last with all our might, secure in the conviction that the Great Power which bore us will bear others also, and round out in fulness of fruition the lives brought forth.

Some such faith is an absolute necessity, to those who pledge themselves to a cause, for life and for death. Our own action is limited and guided by our own vision, our own opinion, our own knowledge. Others, with a different, or a defective experience act variously: some in ways of which we do not approve; some in ways that are proved mistaken; and others by methods that are mutually destructive. A certain hope and joy is essential to all work. It would take a Titan like Bhishma himself, to throw his whole heart into a losing cause, a cause that he knew belonged neither to God nor the future. Mere mortals are not so made. The nation maker, therefore, works to his utmost; but he must be free to realise the while that very little depends on him, that his work achieves significance only from that immense current of destiny that is working through him and his efforts, and that, whatever outward form it might take, it would, so long as it was whole-hearted and sincere be carried in the self-same way, on that self-same stream.

Super-consciousness the ground of action.

In other words, behind the best work lies a quiet super-consciousness—knowledge that the work itself is not the great thing, but the spirit that speaks in it. It is the purpose of help and redemption, the pitying love, the steadfast hope, that determines the value of the act. The deed itself, the work performed is merely apparent, and does not count, in comparison with the thought-force sent out, and the spiritual energy generated. God is working through many people to-day, in different ways, and though mistakes may entail suffering, and hatred is a mistake, yet even these defects cannot retard the onward march of what has been begun.

Who then, are to be condemned?

Are we then to condemn no one? Are all to be held equally useful, equally valuable, since, whether they will or not, God works through all equally? Is the renegade to be pardoned, and the traitor treated as a saint? Very much the contrary. We are not to ask that a man stand with us, but we are always to demand that he stand with God. Here there must be no slackness. The politician and extremist, the religious and the Swadeshi worker, the social reformer and the ultra-orthodox can all co-operate, as long as they can heartily respect each other's characters. It is the only possible foundation for common faith and work. Once let the character be found questionable, however, and the worker is better passed on one side. If the heart of a man be divided in its allegiance, that man is not the mouthpiece of God. Honest conviction and sincerity of purpose are all that is necessary; but conversely, we cannot be too stern and clear in our condemnation of dishonesty, treachery, or insincerity.

Nationality will be the synthesis of all righteous forms of effort, but it has neither hope nor heaven to offer to the man who makes and teaches a lie. On the one side infinite charity, on the other unrelenting condemnation. Idling is bad enough in the day of our need and opportunity. But deceit and falsehood of intention are not to be condoned.

Common Fallacies.

A lie that we often hear, is the lazy man's promise that God will some day send us an Avatar to rouse and aid us. These are the fallacies of sluggards, who would fain turn over in their comfortable beds, and dream that they are safe. Face to face with the great life of Dakshineswar, it is difficult to put up with such fatuous self-assurance. Said the pots, discussing their future destiny, and alarmed at the prospect of possible breakage, "Tush! the potter is a good fellow! It will be well!" Of this quality is the faith of the man who is looking for a future divine revelation, before he stirs. The revelation will come. The world throbs with such, hourly. But it will pass the slumberer by. "Rascal!" said Tota Puri to—"Fire is burning before your door, and you have come to the sands of the Nerbada for heat!" The world could not bear a second birth like that of Ramkrishna Paramahansa, in five hundred years. The mass of thought that he has left, has first to be transformed into experience; the spiritual energy given forth has to be converted into achievement. Until this is done, what right have we to ask for more? What could we do with more?

The place of religion in India.

Religion always, in India, precedes national awakenings. Sankaracharya was the beginning of a era that swept round the whole country, culminating in Chaitanya in Bengal, the Sikh Gurus in the Punjab, Sivaji in Maharashtra, and Ramanuja and Madhavacharya in the South. Through each of these, a people sprang into self-realisation, into national energy, and consciousness of their own unity. Sri Ramkrishna represents a synthesis, in one person, of all the leaders. It follows that the movements of his age will unify and organise the more provincial and fragmentary movements of the past.

Ramkrishna Paramahansa is the epitome of the whole. His was the great super-conscious life which alone can witness to the infinitude of the current that bears us all ocean-wards. He is the proof of the Power behind us, and the future before us. So great a birth initiates great happenings. Many are to be tried as by fire, and not a few will be found to be pure gold; but whatever happens, whether victory or defeat, speedy fulfilment or prolonged struggle, the fact that he has been born and lived here in our midst, in the sight and memory of men now living, is proof that God hath sounded forth the trumpet That shall never call retreat!

He is sifting out the hearts of men
Before His judgment seat:
Oh, be swift my soul, to answer Him,
Be jubilant, my feet!
While God is marching on!

Mine eyes have seen the glory of the coming of the Lord,
He is trampling out the vintage where the grapes of wrath are stored;
He hath loosed the fateful lightning of His terrible swift sword,
His Truth is marching on!

I have seen Him in the watch-fires of a hundred circling camps;
They have buikled Him an altar in the evening
dews and damps;
I can read His righteous sentence by the dim and flaring lamps:
His day is marching on!

He has sounded forth the trumpet that shall never call retreat,
He is sifting out the hearts of men before His judgment-seat;
Oh, be swift my soul to answer Him, be jubilant my feet!

THE NEW HINDUISM.

— o —
Every new period in our political history creates a new period in Hindu worship. The ideas that surround us from our birth are like geological strata, piled one upon another, and each bearing the marks of the time in which it rose. A crisis so important as the present, must, in its turn, leave a deep impression on our religion, thought and customs. It is, of course, understood that the new, if it is to be persistent, must be constituted by a return upon the old. It must form a development, not an invention. This is why we do not notice that we are living in the midst of a new Hinduism. The new Hinduism is merely the old, finding new utterance and application. When we read the great pronouncements of Vivekananda, they are so like the words of our own grandparents heard in our childhood, that we fail to remember that they are being spoken in the midst of a foreign people, and falling upon strange ears. This fact that our religion now stands before the world, demanding its rightful place,—determined to find the souls that belong to it, even if it have to seek for them to the ends of the earth—is in itself a revolution, of a most profound and searching character. It is a revolution, moreover, that no one dreams of denying. All the world admits that it has taken place. But true revolutions never stop with themselves. They are like the first circles formed on the water, when a stone is thrown. They go on and on, producing other circles. Similarly, every revolution is the source of rhythmic changes in the society in which it occurs, which go on and on, producing secondary and tertiary changes, to the end of the epoch, when they are swallowed up and re-energised by the nuclear forces of the succeeding age.

A movement of national dimensions must have a new philosophical idea behind it, which will, however, be new in appearance only being really an immense dynamic concentration and re-birth of all that is already familiar to the people. In it, the nation recognises, with pride and delight, its own, the national, genius. Every man knows that he and his ancestors have contributed to the making, developing and conserving, of this, the national, treasure. A thrill of self-reliance passes across a whole people. Their feet tread firmer, their heads are held higher, they feel for the first time, the gigantic power that surges within them.

For fifteen hundred years, at least the Gita has been, amongst all our texts preeminently the national scripture. Today it stands, like a new discovery, as the gospel of the national revival. But this newness is only an optical illusion, arising from the accident that today for the first time, we can compare it with the other scriptures of the world, and so view it in its wholeness. Seen thus, we find that it stands alone. Wherever we open it, we find it talking of the Presence that pervades all things, the one that throbs throughout the Many the vast and shadowy Infinite, that cannot be named or measured, seen or touched, yet solves all mysteries, and bestows all freedom. Other faiths deal with fragmentary experiences, and symptomatic emotions; here alone we are on the ground of the all-comprehensive, the universal, the absolute. No wonder that a six-weeks reading of it stirred the American Emerson to the writing of the greatest of all his works, the essay on the "Over-Soul." If the national intellect be capable, in many fields, of achievements as great as this in religion, where is the limit to the power of the Indian mind? "He that is with us is more than all the hosts of them that be against us."

But it is not only in religious philosophy, that the influence of the present age and its problems is likely to make an indelible impression. It will re-act also upon our ritual and ceremonial life. There is no doubt that Hindu worship needs badly some means of corporate and organised democratic expression. The little service that is held nightly at the tree beside the Howrah Bridge, derives all its popularity from the fact that it tends unconsciously to supply this need. One great reason for the success of Chaitanya in Bengal, lay in the fact that his Sankirtans, with their singing and ecstatic dancing, afforded means of self-expression to the populace. Nor can it be doubted that the organised services of the Brahmo Samaj are a great basis of their popularity.

All the parts of a Christian church are represented in a Hindu temple, showing that even the architecture of Christianity comes from the East. But the national genius of Christian peoples for organised co-operation has been reflected even in their worship, and the nat-mandir, or choir, is placed, with them, directly in front of the sanctuary, or temple proper, while the nave, or court of the people is in front of the choir or nat-mandir. The whole is bound together under a single roof, and the building narrows at the choir, so that it and the sanctuary stand alone, with the people before them, at their feet. The effect of this arrangement is that the building, from whatever point we view it, culminates in the altar, and that the people, however far away they be, still form an integral and necessary part of every service and act of worship.

It is important that we also should evolve services in which the people are conceived of as an essential and unseparably factor, fully articulate, and taking a recognised part in an organised worship. For this, we must re-scrutinise our old rites, and try to restore to them their ancient complex meanings, of the ages before the priest alone became the repository and executor of sacramental acts. Doubtless this new tendency will affect our ecclesiastical architecture, in course of time. For us, however, at the moment, this is of no consequence, being merely an effect. What we have to think of, is the setting in motion of causes. Just as in the family ceremonies, different members of the family—the father, the mamma, the women, other, mother-in-law—and sisters-in-law have each their appointed function and individual part, so in this civic and national ritual of the future, different sections of the people must play their allotted parts. We cannot imagine a Service of Civic Praise here in Calcutta, for instance, in which possibly a pradakshina of the municipal boundaries might be performed, and a great fire of consecration lighted, on some specially sanctified spot, unless all the various parts of Calcutta were fully represented. Nor could anything be grander than a great civic anthem in which the men of Bhowanipur, Entally Burra Bazar and the rest, each section headed by their own Brahmins, should all chant separate stanzas, each ending in the united acclamations of the whole city.

The pradakshina in an incipient procession, and the value of the procession, for purposes of communal ritual, is obvious. Lights, banners, shanks, bells, Varres the carrying of flowers and branches, and the sprinkling of Ganges water, all have their place in such celebrations. India is the land of processions. It ought not to be difficult so to develop this rite, as to give it a new and unforeseen significance. The beautiful ceremonies of Hindu weddings are full of suggestions. The reciting of texts and litanies in antiphon, that is to say, by two parties of worshippers in question and answer, or in alternation, as responses, to sentences of exhortation by the priest, is a most impressive mode of democratic worship. The prayer-drama organises the worshippers and creates a communal idea. In these ceremonies, the India, earth, water, and banner ought to be the supreme symbols, winning all hearts, by their very simplicity and pathos. We shall not be able to return upon this subject. We therefore commend it to the consideration of our readers, calling for their personal attention.

WOMAN IN MODERN INDIA.

The saying that Indian regeneration will come through Indian women is growing hackneyed. The words are found on the lips of many who have not troubled to think clearly what they mean. The fact is, by the education of women we mean to-day her civilisation. The problem of the age, for India, as we have constantly insisted, is to supersede the family, as a mode of, and even as a form of, consciousness, by the civitas, the civic and national unity. This cannot be done by men, as men, alone. It is still more necessary that it should be done by women. In all questions of the moral and personal life, woman is a far greater factor than man. In her care lies the synthesis of life. As she determines the character of the home, out of which man goes forth to his day's labour, so also it is her conception of what life as a whole should be that dominates and creates the world. Man is only a clever child; in woman's care and keeping is the well of life. It follows that while man must always take the lead in special departments of activity, it is at the same time of the highest importance that general scheme of life should be understood by the women of a community, and should not be such as to shock and outrage their sense of right. We all know how important it is to individual women that men and women should be in full mental accord, and we can well believe that if a community is to put forth its utmost energy in any given direction, it will be necessary that its men and its women should be combined in the one great effort.

This is our position to-day. We are determined to initiate new developments. For this, it is essential that we make our own material, and of all our material, none is in this sense so important as the women. A great deal of our nationalising energy, therefore, has to be given, during the coming years, to making the women of our families more devoted to the country than they are, even to their fathers, husbands, and brothers, and qualified to judge still better what will serve the welfare of the nation, than as to that of the family. This is all, the essence of the whole matter. It amounts to the reception of a new idea, for our women have not been accustomed to think much of larger areas than the village at utmost. The impingement of new ideas creates enormous energy. It is likely, therefore, that those who are really touched, will show the fact at once, by an eagerness to be taught reading and writing. It is obvious that if they can once read they will be in a position to feed their own national sense for themselves. But many will be too old, or will not have the faculty, to master the new methods of knowledge. Not on this account are any to be passed by. Reading and writing are not in themselves education. The power to use them well is vastly more important than the things themselves. A woman in whom the great compassion is awakened, a woman who understands the national history, a woman who has made some of the great tirthas and has a notion of what her country looks like, is much more truly and deeply educated than one who has merely read much. "Awake! Awake!" means, first of all, awake to the great multiform consciousness, let everything that is Indian breathe and eat and work through you. Identify yourself, in thought, day by day, with all sorts of strange beings and strange interests, recognising that they, with you, possess equally the common home. Dedicate some part of every pūja, to this thought of the Mother who is Swadesh. Lay a few flowers before Her, pour out a little water in Her name. Think of Her children, your own kindred, who are one in need. Let your hearts go out in infinite pity. "Mother and Motherland," says the proverb, "is better than Swarga!" Ah, the sorrow for those who are ahungered, and cannot feel this joy! "Awake! Awake!" Rise up and get ye knowledge, womanhood of India! womanhood of Bengal! Learn of your own past. Only so can you realise your future. Learn of your country and her needs. Only by this can you train your judgement, your will, and power of choice. Only by growing knowledge can the heart be enriched, and thought become clearer. "Awake! Awake!" Be free and work. Let selflessness guide the hand, and love inspire the will. So shall no sacrifice be defeated, and every movement shall avail. No bondage shall hinder those who have risen to this height. No ignorance shall stand. No vastness of the task before them shall dismay. Bande Mataram. All the problems of to-day have to be attacked on a national scale. The problem of problems is the achievement of nationality itself. But in this matter of the education of women, it will be well if our men can remember exactly what part of the task is its core and essence. Let us talk with our womenkind about the affairs of the country. Let us appeal constantly to the growing judgment and enthusiasm. Let us create these qualities in them, if they do not already exist, by believing steadfastly in the Atman who is within all. The doctrine of the divinity of the human soul has no meaning whatever if it is not this, that each one of us—man or woman, high or low, learned or ignorant,—is in spirit the Pure, the Free, the All-wise, and that the one help we can render another is to evoke this realisation in its fullness.

Daily the life of our Indian womanhood is shrinking. Day by day, their scope is being lessened. Unless we can capture for them the new world of expression, they will steadily continue to lose more and more of the world they had. If Sita and Savitri are ever again to be born of Indian mothers, we must create new types for them; suited to the requirements of the modern age. Gandhari must live again, with new names to think of, but all the ancient faith and courage, stead-greatness and sacrifice. Damayanti must return, and Draupadi, fit wife for Yudisthira, king of justice. Awake! Awake! greatness of Indian womanhood must be the cry of Indian men.

A SYSTEM OF NATIONAL EDUCATION. SENSE-IMPROVEMENT BY PRACTICE. CHAPTER VI.

Another cause of the inefficiency of the senses as gatherers of knowledge is insufficient use. We do not observe sufficiently or with sufficient attention and closeness and a sight, sound, smell, even touch or taste knocks in vain at the door for admission. This tamasic inertia of the receiving instruments is no doubt due to the inattention of the buddhi, and therefore its consideration may seem to come properly under the training of the functions of the intellect, but it is more convenient, though less psychologically correct, to notice it here. The student ought to be accustomed to catch the sights, sounds, etc. around him, distinguish them, mark their nature, properties and sources and fix them in the chitta so that they may be always ready to respond when called for by the memory.

It is a fact which has been proved by minute experiments that the faculty of observation is very imperfectly developed in men, merely from want of care in the use of the senses and the memory. Give twelve men the task of recording from memory something they all saw two hours ago and the accounts will all vary from each other and from the actual occurrence. To get rid of this imperfection will go a long way towards the removal of error. It can be done by training the senses to do their work perfectly, which they will do readily enough if they know the buddhi requires it of them, and giving sufficient attention to put the facts in their right place and order in the memory.

Attention is a factor in knowledge, the importance of which has been always recognised. Attention is the first condition of right memory and of accuracy. To attend to what he is doing, is the first element of discipline required of the student, and, as I have suggested, this can easily be secured if the object of attention is made interesting. This attention to a single thing is called concentration. One truth is, however, sometimes overlooked, that concentration on several things at a time is often indispensable. When people talk of concentration, they imply centring the mind on one thing at a time; but it is quite possible to develop the power of double concentration, triple concentration, multiple concentration. When a given incident is happening, it may be made up of several simultaneous happenings or a set of simultaneous circumstances, a sight, a sound, a touch or several sights, sounds, touches occurring at the same moment or in the same short space of time. The tendency of the mind is to fasten on one and mark others vaguely, many not at all or, if compelled to attend to all, to be distracted and mark none perfectly. Yet this can be remedied and the attention equally distributed over a set of circumstances in such a way as to observe and remember each perfectly. It is merely a matter of abhyasa or steady natural practice.

It is also very desirable that the hand should be capable of coming to the help of the eye in dealing with the multitudinous objects of its activity so as to ensure accuracy. This is of an use so obvious and imperatively needed, that it need not be dwelt on at length. The practice of imitation by the hand of the thing seen is of use both in detecting the lapses and inaccuracies of the mind in noticing the objects of sense and in registering accurately what has been seen. Imitation by the hand ensures accuracy of observation. This is one of the first uses of drawing and it is sufficient in itself to make the teaching of this subject a necessary part of the training of the organs.

The public are wanted to know that Bengal Stores the well renowned Swadeshi Emporium removed to 27, Cornwallis Street where Bharat Bhandar formerly situated.

CONVERSATIONS OF THE DEAD.

—o—

Two Souls in Pitri-lok.

First Soul: How weary am I of the subtle pleasures of this long existence! Satiated with sweetness, fanned by southern breezes, surrounded by wondrous gardens, I long to cast off all, all, and to escape. I cry out for the hard, for the terrible, for freezing cold and burning heat. I desire to sound to its depths the ocean of my own being, to grapple with things strange, and difficult, and overwhelming. A single range of experience wearies me. Let me taste the bitterness of sorrow. Let me learn what I could suffer. Let me explore my own powers, to their remotest frontiers. I seek Freedom! Yea, and will not be denied!

Second Soul: Again, dear Lord, is come the hour that we remember of old. How often in the past can we recall how we met on earth and, thou by sword and I by fire, we fled together, along the shadowy paths, to this our swarga! And now is lived out again the dream of worship. Now once more comes the moment of awaking. Here, to each other, we have been as thoughts. Each has seen only the radiance, the glory of the other. There, we must cover ourselves with the garment of earth, woven as that is of mingled good and evil, of hate and love. Here we have known only the friendship of the heroes. There blindness will come upon us, we shall fight with some of these, as foes. Alas, alas, is the time then indeed come, that we should return to earth?

First Soul: Listen, Beloved! Hearest thou not the wail that rises from the land we loved? Hearest thou not the sob of bereavement, the cry of hunger, the sorrowful moan of small things trampled on? Is there no stirring of pity in thine heart? Is thine own bliss sufficient for thee? Canst thou remain content, in this hour of her need, to leave our earth unvisited? Wouldst thou leave others to suffer, all unaided? Feelest thou not the longing for sacri-face, the strength for sorrow, the thirst for strife?

Second Soul: Ah! Sweet was the silence of death on the field of Kurukshetra! Gently fell the twilight beneath the trees, when the heroes lay dead beside the Jumna. And methinks again at dawn that I heard through Swarga the sound of the battle-shank. The Lord Kartikeya it may be, marshals his hosts once more, and the heroes meet, ere again they go down to the clash of worlds. I awaken! Oh, I awaken! Yea, and I shall follow thee. Yet never again, Beloved, shall I stand as thy wife beside thee, on the fields of earth. Never again shall I comfort thee in defeat, and assuage thy fevered wounds! Seven times trod I the road-way of fire, fearlessly following thee into Swarga. Alas my heart misgives me, lest I meet thee not below!

First Soul: Nay, nay, thou foolish heart! Can they be parted, whose love and hope are one? Seest thou not that side by side we stand henceforth? In thee alone, with thy great past, can the heroes and leaders of our beloved land find metal ready molten to their purpose! Come thou, Beloved! Come thou, my younger comrade! The sorrow of the world calls us! We return to earth!

THOUGHTS AND COMMENTS.

BY BIPIN CHANDRA PAL.
VI.

Nationalism and Nationalists.

Mazzini's definition of Nationality is a perfect definition. No more accurate or comprehensive definition of the term has yet been given. It is, he said, the individuality of the nation. The conception is, essentially, organic. The very first and fundamental pronouncement of modern Sociology is that Society is an organism. An organism means a thing that has an end unto itself. It is a thing that essentially exists for itself. It may have a multitude of outer relations, and through these outer relations, it may serve other than its own organic ends also. But all these outer relations are more or less secondary, contributory to its own organic life and activities, and have their value not in themselves but in these fundamental life and activities of the organism. This organic conception of Society necessarily posits before each Society an aim to be reached. This is a specific aim. The essential aim in every evolutionary process is specific. In biological evolution, the development of the particular biological type represented by the organism, is this specific end. Similarly, in sociological evolution, the development of the particular social type represented by the social organism is this specific end. And it is the special and specific sociological type, which any particular group of humanity may represent, that constitutes Nationality.

Any chance collection of human units or human families, is therefore, not a Nation. Even territorial unity would not necessarily make them a Nation. Nationality is essentially a question of race. A Nation is a sub-division of race. Race is genus, Nation is species. A race may be spread over widely-separated area. It may occupy the most distant parts of the globe.

But neither differences of climate and other physical and physiographical conditions, nor difference of language or religion, or of historical evolution, can altogether destroy the fundamental unity of racial characteristics. All that these do is to cause variations in the species, contributing to the different Nations, belonging originally to a Race, their special national characteristics, and, thereby, bringing out what Mazzini calls the individuality of these nations. Sometimes there are cases of racial amalgamation, when people of different races, thrown into the same territorial unit, and brought under the same historical conditions either through conquest or colonisation, and perhaps even converted to the same religion, gradually grow into a mixed and composite nation. The growth of these composite nations is also determined by special conditions. As in biology cross-breeding is possible and successful under certain conditions only, and not universally or indiscriminately; so also in sociology. Two races, widely different from each other in physical, mental, and spiritual endowments and character, and occupying widely different stages of social and economic evolution, though they may be thrown into the same territory, and even be made to profess the same religion, and taught to speak the same language, will not necessarily form one Nation. Cross-breeding, under such circumstances, will not improve either of the races, but result in inevitable atavism and consequent racial degeneration and decay. In our own times, the impact of widely different races and cultures, as in America and Australia, has resulted in a gradual decay and extinction of the inferior races. But healthy and advantageous admixture of races is also not unknown in history. In Europe, we find examples of it in Portugal and Spain. We see it also in the general appropriation of the Jews by almost every European nation, even in our own day. Physical environments, historical situations, racial contacts and conflicts, all these contribute to the development of national peculiarities, and thus help to differentiate the different branches of the same race, but they neither create, nor can they obliterate the original and organic structure and end of a nation.

It is comparatively easy to express the nation-idea in these general terms, but exceedingly difficult to specify it, in regard to particular nations, in a definite and concrete way. This specification can only be made through a very careful study and analysis of the course of past historic evolution of the nation. The specific national characteristics must be sought for and discovered (i) in the original racial structure of the nation, and (ii) in its physical and social environments, which working upon those original racial elements, gave a special tone and type to its thought and life, developing the peculiarities of its literatures, its arts, its philosophies and theologies, its social, sacerdotal, and economic, political economies and organisations. The history of a nation, using the term history in its widest sense, always supplies the key to its essential life and character.

Racial types are discovered mainly in three things, (a) the physical structure of the race, (b) its thought-structure, and (c) its social structure. These are fundamental factors of racial, and through the racial, of national differentiation. The ordinary European, while even dabbling in sociology, very rarely has the capacity and the culture to investigate and understand these deeper notes of racial or national characteristics. To him, the nation-idea is essentially a territorial and political ideal. The race-problem resolves itself, to his mind, into an essentially colour problem. The Oriental, for instance, is to him one type of humanity, and the Occidental is another. He rarely stops to consider that a geographical term is not necessarily a racial or national connotation. But careful sociological researches, by the help of the dominant methods of modern culture, namely, the comparative, the historical, and the evolutionary methods, would reveal typical differentiations as between one nation and another both in Asia and Europe. The Orientals are no more representative of one dominant type than are the Occidentals. Indeed, racial distinctions are less marked in Europe than in Asia. This is due partly to the fact that most of the European races belong to one great branch of the human family, and owing to this fact, the original physical and physiological structure, as well as the original thought-structure and social structure, is practically the same among the different European nations. The Christianisation of Europe has been another great factor in helping to minimise, though it could not obliterate, national differentiations in the Western continent. But Asia is a land of many races. The religions of Asia are as many. Owing to the peculiarities of Asiatic life and religion, intermixture between different nations has been more difficult than it has been in Europe. Yet, in spite of it all, European influence, so frequently masquerading as culture, generally sets down the Persian and the Chinese, the Hindu and the Arab, the Armenian and the Egyptian, all as essentially one type of race and culture. In truth, however, leaving out of account the primitive Asiatic races, like the aborigines of India or the Pacific Islanders, Asia has been the home of three distinct and developed races and cultures, namely, the Aryan, the Semitic, and the Mongolian to which, perhaps, even a fourth though now merged into the Hindu race and culture, may be added, namely, the Dravidian. There are fundamental and structural physical, mental, and social differences between these different branches of the great human family.

The Hindu, though classed as an Oriental, is, in physiological, social and thought structure, more akin to the European than to many of the other Asiatic races. The Arab and the Armenian have greater affinity in physical as well as in social and thought structure, with the European Jew than with the Chinese or the Hindu.

For the understanding of the true philosophy of nationalism, an investigation into these racial characteristics and their place and significance in social evolution and history is essential. For it is such an investigation that can alone bring out what Mazzini called, the individuality of a people.

HAND-LOOM WEAVING.

By far the most important of Indian handicrafts is, as I have said, hand-loom weaving. For very many years the view which has prevailed with the Government of India has been that of the "practical" man who regards the hand-loom as obsolete, even for artistic purposes. Sir George Watt, in the official report of the Delhi Durbar Exhibition, wrote with reference to hand-loom weaving that "to bolster up the cliche methods and appliances of bygone times would of necessity involve the suppression of national progression"; and Lord Curzon was only voicing the opinion of his scientific advisers when he said in his speech at the Durbar that it was inevitable that the hand-loom should be superseded by the power-loom, just as the hand-punkah was being superseded by the electric fan. The suffering inflicted upon the millions of the industrial population in the last fifty years through this official theory, and the commercial loss which official inaction in the matter of village handicrafts has meant to India, will perhaps never be realized; but the remarkable revival in hand-loom weaving which is now taking place throughout India should be sufficient to show that there are considerations in Indian industrial problems which the scientific European expert is apt to overlook.

It will hardly be necessary to point out to members of this Society the immense importance for India of the preservation of village handicraft, or to explain the bearing of this problem upon art administration. It cannot be too strongly insisted that the skill of her hand-weavers, numbering some 5,000,000 craftsmen, or more, is one of the most important economic and artistic assets India possesses. Even accepting, for the sake of argument, that the hand-loom is bound to be eventually superseded by the power-loom in all but sumptuary textile products, the possibility of prolonging the existence of the bulk of the hand-loom industry for another fifty years is still a matter of vital importance. Financiers do not hesitate to invest their capital in opening up gold mines, because they know that in fifty years most mines are exhausted. The hand-loom weaving industry represents for India capital much greater than that of all the gold mines in Mysore, and it is used to much greater public advantage. The revival of village handicraft is becoming one of the most pressing social problems of the day in Europe. So much the more important it is for India not to allow to diminish or deteriorate the great village industry which now forms by far the most important section of her industrial organisation.

It will be obvious from what I have said of the present constitution of the Schools of Art that the work inside the schools is altogether too insignificant to have any direct effect upon traditional Indian handicraft, and until the last few years there has been no technical institution in the whole of India which concerned itself directly with the interests of the most important of Indian handicrafts. But the opportunities given me by Sir M. E. Grant Duff, soon after my arrival in Madras, for investigating the condition of the Indian traditional crafts drew my attention to the terribly neglected state of the hand-loom weaving industry. The Indian hand-weaver has suffered, and still suffers, in two ways. First, the weavers of broadens, like the kincobs of Benares, and all the finer textiles used by the richer classes of the population, suffer from the artistic ignorance of their aristocratic and wealthy patrons. The apparatus and the methods are practically the same as those used by hand-weavers of the same class in Europe, and the best hand-weaver in Europe rarely equals them in technical skill. They stand in very little need of technical assistance, certainly not of the kind now offered to them. I cannot too strongly protest, and I am sure that all artists and art-workers in Europe will join me in protesting, against the efforts which are now being made by some of the scientific advisers of Government to introduce into these world-famed handicrafts of India the mechanical methods of modern commercialism, thereby destroying all the artistic value they now possess. It is one thing to show the hand-weaver how he may reduce the mechanical labour of putting together the threads of his warp and weft—that is legitimate art. It is quite another thing to teach him to use mechanical apparatus for stereotyping his patterns—that is like bringing a reaping machine into one's garden to cut flowers with. One of the first things to be done when art administration is put upon a rational footing in India is to check the ravages of the commercial technical expert in our Indian garden.

The assistance that can be given to the Indian weaver of the highest grade lies, not in "improving" his methods according to the ideas of the European mechanic, but in the better artistic education of his patrons, by reviving the prestige of Indian art, and by widening the scope of the University curriculum, so as to add some degree of artistic culture to the crude utilitarianism which still forms the basis of the Anglo-Indian educational system. It is the weaver's patrons and not the weaver who require education in this case.

The case of the ordinary village weaver who works for the poorer classes is different. He, too, suffers from the artistic ignorance of his patrons, but more from his own total ignorance of those simple mechanical improvements in his apparatus which in the eighteenth century enable the hand-weaver in Europe to treble his output. The quality of the cloth produced by the village weaver is in most cases much better than that of the power-loom fabrics which compete with his, but it is insuperable for him to improve the mechanical efficiency of the apparatus he uses, in order to compete with the latter in point of cheapness, which in the eyes of his indigent patrons is the first consideration. There are several extremely simple and valuable mechanical improvements used in plain weaving and in preparing the warp for the loom which would enable him to do this, and to them there can be no artistic objection. Their simplicity and cheapness makes them especially adaptable to the needs of the village weaver, but they have been almost totally unknown in India, outside a few mission industrial schools; and in all the numerous schemes for technical education which have been launched in India for the last twenty-five years nothing was done in this matter until in 1901 I called public attention to a colony of native weavers in Bengal, numbering some 14,000, who, through adopting these improvements, had been able to double their earnings, in spite of the competition of power-loom mills. This was the beginning of a great movement for the revival of hand-loom weaving, which, in spite of much cold water thrown upon it in the first instance by the scientific advisers of Government, has been steadily growing in strength every year, though mostly through private enterprise and nonofficial encouragement.

Some years ago I enlisted in this cause the services of a well-known firm of English textile experts, Messrs. Hatterley and Sons, of Keighley, who, at the invitation of the Roumanian Government, had started a wonderfully successful revival of hand-loom weaving in the Balkan States. They have given much time and attention to the technical problems connected with Indian hand-weaving, and have been so far successful that they are now exporting every week to India a number of improved hand-loom, with preparatory apparatus, sufficient for a small hand-factory. The significance of this fact may be realised when I tell you that it was only through the establishment of one hand-loom factory at Serampore, in the time of the Danish Government, about 70 years ago, that the 10,000 weavers in Bengal acquired the means of doubling their earnings. Now, through the agency of Messrs. Hatterley alone, there are numbers of hand-loom factories being started all over India every year, which will open the eyes of many more thousands of village weavers to the use of those mechanical improvements in their apparatus which are necessary for the continued existence of their handicraft. Better still, the importance of the technical improvement of hand-weaving appliances is now being realised by Indians belonging to the weaving caste and others, so that every year various kinds of improved appliances are being introduced locally.

There is, however, a considerable danger that owing to the ignorance and poverty of the village weaver, this movement may be used more for the benefit of the middle-class speculator than for the revival of village handicraft, and, so far, the somewhat belated efforts of Government in the matter are being directed more towards assisting the middle-class speculator than the village weaver. Official experts who have been at last convinced of the possibility of reviving hand-loom weaving in India, seem to regard the commercial side of the question as much more important than the artistic and sociological side, and Government seems hitherto to have shared in this view. But, I think, it cannot be too strongly insisted that the artistic and sociological side of India's industrial problem is infinitely more important, not only for India, but for the world at large, than the commercial side. It is of vastly greater importance that India, with the help of the great traditional industrial organisation which she still possesses, should show the world how a prosperous system of village handicraft may be built up in conjunction with agriculture, than it is to show how she can add some crores of rupees to her income by the methods of Western commercialism. The increased income may be a great matter, but the means by which the increase is to be gained is a vastly greater one. I know this is the argument of the sentimentalist and idealist but India is the home of idealism, and the whole revival of hand-loom weaving in India was, and still is, to the practical man, purely a matter of sentiment. Our industrial system, both in this country and in India, needs some grains of sentiment of heaven its dead mass of dry materialism. Economics without sentiment are the economics of barbarism; and commercialism without the artistic impulse only leads India on the high road to anarchy.

THE ARCHITECTURAL POLICY OF THE PUBLIC WORKS DEPARTMENT.

I will leave this question and turn to another official windmill against which I have been tilting with less success in the last twenty years—the architectural policy of the Public Works Department. It is hardly necessary to explain in detail its bearing upon the art administration of India. Mr. Cecil Burns, in the paper I have referred to before, admitted that, as nearly all the decorative arts have originated from and are dependent upon the style of architecture they are intended to enrich, the decision to adopt European styles in Government and other buildings must exercise a powerful influence upon the practice of all the crafts allied to the building trade, and through them upon the teaching of the schools of Art. Yet he was content to put this question, as well as the teaching of the fine arts, on one side, and to attribute the depressed condition of Indian handicraft chiefly to the opening of the Suez Canal. He considered that the arguments for and against the adoption of European styles in modern Indian buildings were sufficiently stated in a paper, read before this Society, by Mr. T. Roger Smith, F.R.I.B.A., in 1873; and said that the question had been since fully considered in connection with the erection of the Queen Victoria Memorial building in Calcutta.

- I will deal with Mr. Roger Smith's paper first. The gist of his arguments can be shown in a few short extracts. He says: "Let us for consistency's sake be European in art; for art, if it be true, is an expression of national individuality more intense and more truthful than custom, fashion, or government. In the stubbornness with which we retain our nationality we resemble the Romans." This doctrine is more briefly expressed by Mr. Kipling's phrase, "East is East, and West is West, and never the twain shall meet." The stubbornness with which we have clung to this idea has been the main cause of our difficulties in India, but in art matters it is diametrically opposed to the principles which have been laid down by the Secretary of State, and nominally, at least, accepted by the Government of India.

Mr. Roger Smith goes on to state three reasons which might be brought forward for using an Indian style in Indian public buildings. "First, it is said, that it is suited to the climate; secondly, that the natives can do it; and lastly, that it is, or can be, very beautiful." But, he added, "the sufficient answer, of course, is that it may be all these, but that it is not European, far less British. Of the three reasons alluded to, by far the most powerful is the one placed first, namely, that Indian architecture, whether Mohammedan or Hindu, is the offspring of the climate and as such better fitted than anything we can import to the circumstances of the country. Very true, but so is Indian food, Indian dress, Indian living, Indian administration. They are all the offspring of the climate, yet we cling very naturally to the food, the dress, the manners, the principles of governing to which we are accustomed, though while we retain them in principle, we are not unwilling to make such variations in detail as will tend to diminish some of the inconveniences experienced in consequence of the peculiarity of the climate and encourage, leaving the question of encouraging the art of the country, in those cases where the building is devoted to the use of natives of the country, to stand on its own merits." You will observe that Mr. Roger Smith treats the matter of the preservation of Indian art as one of altogether inferior importance to that of nursing our own insular prejudices. But now he comes to the root of the matter. "The second reason for employing the styles of the country, namely, that the natives can design and build in them, is answered by the fact that the natives will not be employed. The buildings which are built for European use and with European funds in India have been invariably built under European supervision and from European designs, and always will be; and though the artificers employed may be natives, yet that does not make the buildings native works any more than the printing in Calcutta of an English book by Hindu compositors makes it a Hindu book."

The answer to what I must call this extraordinary argument simply is that that there are no public buildings in India, built exclusively for European use and with European funds, and though de facto we have excluded Indian architects from the Public Works Department it has never been laid down by official authority that they are always to be so excluded.

I do not think that any responsible British statesman of the present day would wish to argue that the design of public buildings in India must always remain in the hands of European.

If we go back to the original reasons for the adoption of European styles in the Public Works Department it is easy to understand that very little, if any, consideration has ever been given to artistic principles; this policy was simply forced upon the department by the artistic and architectural ignorance of its officers. The designing of public buildings was for very many years placed in the hands of military officers or engineers, who had no training whatever in architecture as an art, and not even the archaeological skill of the average European architectural draughtsman. The Macaulay doctrine established the departmental principle that bad European art was better than good Indian, so the Public Works officers instead of using the architectural skill of the Hindu master-builders, as their Mogul predecessors did under similar circumstances, took their Tressquares and set squares, and with the help of European archaeological diagrams, made their paper designs for public buildings in the so-called "classic" style, their choice being mainly determined by the fact that this style presents fewer difficulties to the amateur architect than any other. Even to this day, this process of departmental routine is taught as architecture, to Indian students, in all the engineering colleges of India by the European professors of drawing and design, and these mechanical exercises enable the engineering graduate of the universities to oust the traditional master-builder from his hereditary and legitimate employment. The first results of these primitive archaeological experiments by the Public Works officers, were sometimes disastrous and dangerous to life and limbs for the Indian workmen employed in executing them. Sometimes the buildings collapsed before they were completed, and accidents of a like nature are not altogether unknown even in the present day.

Occasionally, it must be admitted, the Public Works Department has set a better precedent, and among its officers there have been architects of skill, like Mr. Chisholm and Mr. Buxington in Madras and Sir Swinton Jacob in Jaipur, who have successfully adapted Indian styles to departmental requirements. But they have hardly solved, as the Moguls did, the much more important problem of making full use of the traditional science and art of the Indian master-builder for the purposes of the State. And in this question of style every Viceroy, Governor, Head of Department, and every official architect has been a law to himself. No definite principle has been laid down, and the paramount importance of architectural style in relation to the preservation of Indian art and handicraft has never received the slightest official consideration, though, as one of the artistic advisers of Government, I have endeavoured on every possible occasion in the last twenty years to draw official attention to it.

Mr. Cecil Burns is entirely incorrect in his statement that the matter was fully considered in connection with the scheme for the Victoria Memorial at Calcutta. The facts are that at the first inception of the scheme for the memorial Lord Curzon invited public discussion and suggestions. The suggestion I submitted to Lord Curzon was that as a preliminary measure a competent architect should make a survey of buildings in Northern India constructed by living Indian master-builders who still carry on the traditions of Indian architecture, and that after this was done the design for the memorial should be made in a living Indian style in consultation with the best native master-builders that were found. This was very much the procedure which Shah Jahan adopted in connection with the building of the Taj. Lord Curzon engaged a competent architect, but did not carry out my main suggestion, to investigate thoroughly the living traditions of Indian architecture, for the reason that Calcutta was a European city, and that an Indian style of building would be unsuitable there.

I cannot myself conceive how it is possible to defend the Public Works policy on practical, aesthetic, or ethical grounds. The reasons given for it always seem to be pedantic, when they are not frankly philistine and indifferent to the interests of art. Let us suppose for a moment that there existed in England at the present day a large number of master-builders, masons, and other craftsmen who had at their finger-tips all the architectural and craft traditions of the Middle Ages. Would architects and artists say that it was impossible, or undesirable, to employ these men in Government work because they did not know Latin and Greek, had no certificates from the Board of Education, and could not draw their designs on paper to an exact scale for the approval of the Local Government Board? And what would His Majesty's Opposition in the House of Commons say if, in the discussion on the Estimates, it was found that Government departments were sometimes employing architects, sculptors and decorators from Calcutta for public buildings in London, and paying them ten, or fifty times the rate of wages these English master-builders and craftsmen demand, because the provincial English styles were not considered departmentally correct? In England such a situation is unthinkable, but it is actually the situation which has been considered right and proper for India during the last fifty years, and this is the situation which the art experts sent out by the Secretary of State to revive Indian art are asked to face. Is it surprising that they sometimes think discretion is the better part of valour?

Mr. Cecil Burns has, however, plenty of courage. He proposes that the School of Art should lie down with the Public Works lion, or, in other words, that the Principals of Schools of Art should accept things as they are, and co-operate with the Public Works Department in the decoration of public buildings. I myself have always strongly advocated such co-operation, provided that the security and free action of the lion could be guaranteed, but I think the lion is rash to thrust its head into the untamed lion's mouth. The system of co-operation was, in fact, as Mr. Chisholm stated in the discussion on Mr. Burn's paper, introduced by him when he was doing the double duties of Superintendent of the School of Arts and Consulting Architect in Madras. But directly I took charge of the school of Arts the Public Works Department withdrew its orders from the school and started workshops of their own. This is an illustration of the difficulties in which Principals of Schools of Art are placed. There is no fixed policy in art matters, and they have practically no voice in the settlement of artistic questions. Until it is the settled policy of the Government of India that living Indian styles shall be adopted as far as possible in all public buildings, there can be no cooperation between Art Schools and the Public Works Department for the advantage of Indian art. The Principal of the School of Art is a subordinate official of the Education Department with a much inferior official status to that of the Consulting Architect and if the latter chooses to have imitation Renaissance, or Gothic, or to invent a style of his own, for the design of public buildings, he is quite at liberty to do so. Moreover, the Schools of Art are quite out of touch with the best Indian builders and decorators, and must always remain so under present conditions. The Mogul policy of making full use of Hindu architects, builders, and decorators, attracted the best of them to the centres of Government. Our Public Works neglect of them has driven them all away to the provinces or Native States, where they can get employment. A single order from the Secretary of State or the Government of India, followed by the consistent and thorough carrying out of that order by competent Departmental authorities, would bring them back; but until that order is given, until it is the settled policy of Government that the living traditions of Indian craftsmanship shall always be utilised for State purposes, the cooperation of Schools of Art with the Public Works Departments can do no benefit to Indian handicrafts, for the simple reason that the real Indian craftsmen hardly ever enter the doors of Schools of Art, or come near them. You may improve the decoration of public buildings by Mr. Burn's scheme, but it does not bring Indian art within the scope of Departmental policy. Mr. Burns wishes to bring the Indian craftsman up-to-date, but he avoids the real issue, that the principal cause of his being out-of-date is the policy of Indian departmentalism for the last fifty years. Sir Hubert Herkomer's remarks on Mr. Burn's paper go deeper than the paper itself. He said:

"The great thing appeared to be the need of some central organisation from which branches could be worked, and at the head of that central organisation should be a strong man with unlimited power. Such a man should not have to fight officials—a great drawback to good work, not only in India but in this country."

THE TRUE REASON FOR THE DEAY OF INDIAN ART AND HANDICRAFT.

There is no inherent weakness in Indian art, as practised by living Indian craftsmen, to account for its decline under our rule, nor is the opening of the Suez Canal a sufficient explanation. The condition of Indian art and craft when we assumed the government of the country was not materially different from that which prevailed when the Moguls conquered Hindustan, and if we had followed Akbar's sound artistic policy, India would have seen a great artistic revival instead of a most lamentable decline under British administration. The true reason and the chief reason for the decay of Indian art and handicraft has been the want of good administration in art matters and the consequent impotence of the art advisers of Government. The same false distinction which is still made in the Schools of Art between the fine arts and industrial arts is still made by Government between Indian art and Indian industry. An art expert is not supposed to be concerned in Indian industrial questions, though in India there is handiyan industry, except agriculture, in which the artistic factor can be treated as of minor importance.

Three times only in the course of my official career of twenty years have there been opportunities afforded by Government for a full discussion of the vital issues affecting Indian art and industry. On none of these occasions were the art experts appointed by the Secretary of State called in to represent the interests of art, and on one of them, when an Industrial Commission was appointed by Lord Curzon, my evidence as a witness was, with the exception of the opening paragraph, entirely suppressed in the official report, and the evidence of a scientific expert substituted for it over my name. Though I called official attention to the error, no correction was made. I can assure you that there was not a single word of my evidence which was unfit for publication; but, even if that were the case, the substitution of evidence which I did not give seemed to me to deserve correction. For obvious reasons it is of great importance that Government should be correctly informed as to the qualifications of its expert advisers. One of the greatest difficulties of art experts in India is that Government has no knowledge of their training and qualifications.

The departmental tradition is that the training of a European scientific specialist gives him a better understanding of the Indian industrial problem than the art expert. As a matter of fact the diplomas expected of an art master for conducting a good English art school are certificates that he has passed through a training in technical matters connected with handicraft which is generally twice as long as the whole course of study required for the scientific degree of the University of London; and the curriculum for the latter hardly touches any of the technical questions connected with Indian industries. The problems of Indian technical education must be solved by whole-hearted co-operation between artists who have a thorough knowledge of the science of art and scientists with artistic intuition, but such co-operation is almost impossible so long as the official status of the artist is wholly inferior, and so long as he is bound hand and foot by departmental authority.

THE FUTURE OF INDIAN ART.

But though I regard the present state of art administration as eminently unsatisfactory, I am by no means pessimistic about the future of Indian art. There is in Indian art a vitality like that of a banyan tree, which may be buried for a time under a land-slide, but will, sooner or later, push its way through and grow with renewed vigour. I have spent a good deal of time in tilting against the official windmills which lie in the path of an art teacher in India, but the real Indian art still lies neglected outside the sphere of Indian departmentalism. Nor have I any reason to be dissatisfied with the results of my campaign, for if I have involved myself in great difficulties I have, at least, made things considerably easier for my successors. Two out of the four of these gaunt and ugly structures are on the point of collapsing. I have had ample testimony in many letters I have received that the views of educated Indians with regard to Indian fine art have undergone a remarkable change in the last few years. The annual exhibition of the Indian Society of Oriental Art in Calcutta, of which Lord Kitchener was the first President, has helped greatly to bring about this change; and whereas you might walk through the exhibitions of the Simla or Bombay Fine Arts Societies without being aware that Indian fine art existed, a mere perusal of the catalogue of the Oriental Art Society's exhibition must be a liberal education in Indian life and thought for most Anglo-Indians, as well as for many English-educated Indians. The Society is doing a great work in promoting a real and mutual understanding between Anglo-Indians and Indians of all classes. Mr. Tagore has revolutionised the methods of teaching fine art in the Calcutta School, and in the last report of the Madras School of Arts I notice that the new Principal, Mr. Hal- away, finds that the more he studies and examines the native methods of teaching drawing the more he is inclined towards them as being really adequate and useful. By way of set-back to this most satisfactory progress, the Bengal Education Department, soon after I left Calcutta, tore to pieces the Drawing Syllabus by which I have begun to coordinate the teaching of art in the School of Art with the teaching in the schools outside it, and, without consulting the School of Art, reverted to the old South Kensington methods, which are entirely opposed to the principle and practice of Indian art. Since my departure, also, an official committee of the University of Calcutta, against the deliberate and almost unanimous vote of the Faculty of Arts, shut the doors of the University to all art teaching, so that now the official teaching of Indian art in Bengal is again confined to the four walls of the School of Art. How long the latter will continue to be a school of Indian art is, under present circumstances, a matter of great uncertainty, for even when the right thing happens, as it were accidentally, there is no continuity of policy, and no official interest in art, except by accident.

With regard to hand-loom weaving Government is now assisting to some extent private enterprise, and though much remains to be accomplished in reviving village handicraft, India seems to be on the eve of a great industrial development, in which the village hand-weaver is bound in the long run to gain its freedom. he believed that it would pass through the same painful process of ideas, which education would bring forth, and which would be the result of a liberal and free education. With the change in public opinion with regard to Indian art, generally, their detrimental influence is largely discounted. Still, I hope for the sake of British prestige that Government will not wait until the opinion of educated Indians in art matters is so fully formed as to create a popular agitation for their removal. If they represented, as Mr. Roger Smith seemed to argue, a strong and stubborn expression of national artistic feeling they would endure as long as the British raj; but when the history of Anglo-Indian departmentalism is impartially examined it will be evident that their origin was never based upon national artistic feeling, but upon national artistic ignorance and departmental inefficiency. And when the history of mediæval art in Europe is fully understood, and the deficiencies of our own national art education are realised, it will be evident, even to the lay mind, that Europe owes an immense debt to the art philosophy of the East, and is as much concerned as India in the preservation of the living traditions of Indian art and architecture. It is essential, as Lord Curzon has said, "that for every department of State there must be a policy, instead of no policy, i.e., a method which is based upon accepted premises, either of reasoning or of experience, and is laid down in clear language understood by the officers who have to apply it, and intelligible to the people to whom it is to be applied." Neither the Education nor the Public Works, the two departments chiefly concerned in India, has any definite policy in art matters which can be Intelligently designed and carefully constructed, this is a rich and varied study of the industrial revolution in America. The author's treatment of the subject is both scholarly and accessible, and his analysis of the economic and social changes of the period is both thorough and convincing. The book is a valuable contribution to the history of the United States, and a must-read for anyone interested in the industrial revolution.

Mr. B. K. Chatterjee, a memorable occasion, said that there is a great feeling prevailing in this country—quite beyond the limits of party—of pity, of sympathy, and of horror at the miseries which our industrial system entails. Nevertheless it is this system, pure and unadulterated, which Indian departmentalism, for the last fifty years, has been recommending as the only practical one under British rule, and using all its influence to propagate. I shall not cease to protest against this recommendation and this propaganda as long as I live.

Indian art is not dead ; it has been sleeping, but is now awakening, and to continue to ignore it in the future as we have done in the past is, I am convinced, the worst of all bad policies, and one which is fraught with evil consequences to our Empire.

PASSING THOUGHTS. RELIGION VERSUS SPIRITUALITY.

Essence and Form.

In every thing we have to distinguish between the essence and the form. Spirituality is that essence, of which religion is one of the forms. If One Fact breathes through all things that constitute the universe, it follows that it is only one, and not the sole form, in which spirituality can find expression. Education, science, poetry, art, are some of the other forms. Indeed there is no activity of man which is not capable of being the vehicle of supreme spirituality, marked, as that is by the flood of realisation of some idea, sweeping away self. Religion tends, more than other things, to be confused with spirituality, because religion is built up of those forms and doctrines, in which humanity has striven from time to time to enshrine the essence of things spiritual. It provides, for most people, the ladders and scaffolding by which at a crisis, they may climb to the heights of the tower of spirituality. But religion, it must be remembered, is only a means, never an end. Spirituality is the aim, and each soul, having in this, reached its own height, may come down by its own stairs, so to speak, may express its vision in its own way.

A Common Fallacy.

If spirituality, then, is a fire, religion can only be thought of as fuel. Fuel will never do, instead of fire, but only as a means to fire. Religious practices and beliefs sometimes appear at their most perfect, in hypocrites, and the worldly wise; spirituality is to be seen only in him who can tread the world beneath his feet. It follows that religion derives all its value from spirituality. It can never be offered as a substitute for it. Spirituality, on the other hand, may choose its own instrument of expression, and religion is but one of the means that lie to its hand. Ramanuja, Chaitanya, Sivaji, Guru Govind, how different are the means of expression, chosen by each one of these! But can anyone dispute the fact that it is a common tide of spirituality that bears them on its flood? Such facts cut the ground from under the feet of the coward who excuses himself from nation-building, on the plea that India is to be saved, 'not by politics, but by religion.' The words are true enough, if by religion is meant the spiritual energy of religion, the volcanic forces that may focus in it, and cleave the earth to find their own path of projection. But if it means a collection of forms, a series of formulæ, the path of safety and popular approval, then the phrase is a lie, and nothing can redeem it.

The Spirit of the Age Makes Its Own Faith.

Is nation-making 'politics'? Or is it, after all, religion? Politics is a word that we associate with divided interests, with warring ideals and rival parties. In nation-making there is but one ideal, carried out by different methods, and the interest is the common interest of self-sacrifice. In the higher use of the word 'religion,' then, nation-building would seem to come nearer to the ideal definition of it, than rites and ceremonies. Indeed it is a perception of this fact that has gathered the whole Indian people in such striking fashion round the banner of nationality, during the last few years. Those who have not ranged themselves beneath it, are mere laggards without a name, who dare not speak above a whisper, to give an account of their position. Different groups claim in widely different ways, to be working out the common end: our point is, that every man claims. Nationality is admitted, as the goal and interpretation of all methods alike. In other words, the spirit of each age creates its own religion, and Nationality is the religion of the present period. Behind it, stand the forces of Indian spirituality, upon it converges the passion of Indian religion. It is aglow with the light of ideal personalities; sanctified by the lofty motives of workers known and unknown; filled with the infinite tides of love and compassion. It feeds itself upon its own service, its own sacrifice. And it opens the road to all, that they may climb upwards. Is Nationality politics, or is it in truth religion, the highest spirituality? Indian Philosophy.

To us as a people it is necessary at this moment to believe in Nationality, as the highest possible expression, for the time, of the spiritual life. It is necessary. And assuredly the world has seen no race which held in its hands so great a treasure as, in this respect, is Indian thought. The One in the Many, the Many equally in the One. No room here, for the superior sanctity of puja-bells to the factory-gong, for the greater holiness of Ganges-bathing than gymnastic exercises! Jnanapada, bhakti-pada, karnapada—all equal, all authentic. No excuse here for the man who says the pujari is enveloped in spirituality, and all others are lower. Other religions may offer pronouncements of this description, but not Hinduism!

To Indian thought alone, there is nothing startling in the words to labour is to pray. Its own message has been nothing less. Struggle is worship. What else does the Gita teach its people? All knowledge is beatitude. There is no Hindu who does not realise this. Then discovery is one with inspiration. Who can deny it? Verily, our faith is even as a land strewn with jewels; for us, it is only to pick them up. In sober truth, it declares to us, all that is true and right is religion: only that which is false, can be excluded.

The Spirituality of the Avatars.

In this sense, we are using the word as one with spirituality. And here we can see the reason of the great law of the national evolution, pronounced by the Gita—"Whenever righteousness decays and unrighteousness prevails, then I manifest Myself." We can see now that a great recrudescence of the national idealism is inevitable, every time it has been betrayed, just as the top of the next wave is inevitable, the moment the bottom of the wave-trough is reached. This great recrudescence comes as the birth of some person, in whom all the existing ideals of the age are summed up. This person attracts to himself all the emotional and intellectual forces of the nation. There is none that can hold back, since the sensitiveness of each one to high vision, will be in exact proportion to his own greatness. India has a trained perception of spiritual power. She finds it irresistible. All her own power is concentrated in a single point, and the magazine of energy thus accumulated and individualised, shakes the very earth, in its effort at constructive expression. Thus the epoch is made by the Avatar; and spirituality becomes the hearth and altar-place of Nationality.

Spirituality versus Religion.

But if we return to the lower sense of the word 'religion', we shall have to admit that the typical representatives of spirituality are never bound by this. They use religion, as common men understand it. They love it. They speak its language. But when they suspect that truth leads outside and beyond, they never hesitate to defy it, to set it at naught. Truth is after all, their religion, and they must need break smaller bounds. Did anyone ever, hear of a great saint who did not transcend some limitation or other? Who has forgotten the tale of Guru Nanuk, and how he went on pilgrimage to Mecca? There he slept, with his feet against the Caabah stone. Moved to righteous indignation, pious Mussalmans came, and woke him up, threatening to kill him, for daring to put his feet on the place where God was. "Ah," said the saint quietly, "Just show me the place where God is not, that I may place my feet there!" And great was the multitude that became his disciples.

Have they not all been of this type, those great souls in whom our nation ought to glory? Ought we to need to be reminded that fire of spirituality, when it is lighted, burns up all the forest, even the jungle of religious rites and doctrines?

IN EITHER CASE.

There are two movements of humanity, upward and downward, and both are irresistible. It may seem for a moment that the downward movement is arrested and an upward lift may for a while rejoice the hearts that are attached to a cause forsaken by God and Destiny.

The majestic or impetuous rise of a religion, an idea, a nation may for a fleeting period be held back by main force and with a fierce and infinite labour the wheel may be driven back for the space of an inch or even two. But God cannot be deceived and God cannot be conquered by violence. Where He is the Charioteer, victory is certain, and if He wheels back, it is only to leave ground which is no longer advantageous to Him and shift the conflict to terrain fixed beforehand for the victory. Often He forces His adversaries to drive Him from ground conquered and occupied in order that they may exhaust their strength on a position never meant to be permanently held and by their very triumph prepare a more decisive overthrow.

Minute minds fix themselves on details and say "Here we have failed, there we have prevailed; and if the record of defeats seems to be long and ill-balanced by doubtful successes, they grow discouraged and apprehend the ruin of their cause. So men deceive themselves as to the trend of events by not keeping their eyes open to the great stream of inevitable tendency which prevails over all back washes and petty currents. And where defeat is predestined for a season, their want of faith leads to the very calamity which they apprehended. The eye of Faith is not one with the eye of Knowledge;—Faith divines in the large what knowledge sees distinctly and clearly; but in the main thing Faith and Knowledge are one and the wisdom of the Lover is justified and supported by the wisdom of the Seer. Faith fights for God, while knowledge is waiting for fulfilment, and so long as the latter is withheld, the former is necessary. For without indomitable Faith or inspired Wisdom no great cause can conquer.

We must look therefore to the great tendency of things and interpret in their light the minute events that are passing at the moment. Is the main tendency of things upward or downward? If it is downward, even then we must strive, for the man who abandons a cause which is right because it is denied success, is despicable, and he inflicts a wound on mankind in the present and the future. Great causes which are fought out boldly to the end are made sacred by courage and suffering, and their resurrection and final victory is inevitable. Only those which are supported by cowards and meanly abandoned, are erased from the books of the future. The mediæval movement of civic liberty in France and Italy failed and gave place to Teutonic despotism, but it revived with a hundredfold force in the French Revolution and it was the impetuous rush earthwards of the souls that had fought for it hundreds of years before that shattered to pieces the once victorious feudal system. But if, as we are assured, the movement is upward, then we may persist in absolute confidence, sure that reverses in details are only meant to prepare and point the true way to victory.

Persistence does not imply persistence in methods that have proved to be infructuous or from which, though temporarily fruitful God has withdrawn His sanction. We must remember that we are a nation not yet trained in the vaster movements of modern politics. Not only our rank and file, but our captains and our strategists need the training of events, the wisdom of experience to make them perfect. Fire, impetuosity, self-sacrifice, intellectual vigour, subtlety, wealth of ideas, fertility of resource to meet unexpected happenings, these have been given to us in abundance. But the perfect experience of the veteran in great battles, the acute political intelligence which comes of long familiarity with the handling of high affairs and national destinies, these are yet in us immature and in a state of pupillage. But God Himself is our master and teacher for He would give to His chosen nation a faultless training and a perfect capacity. Only we must be ready to acknowledge our mistakes, to change our path, to learn. Then only shall we victoriously surmount all obstacles and move steadily, impetuously, but without stumbling or swerving, to our goal.

Moreover, we have weaknesses that are still rampant and uncorrected in our midst. It is our first duty to purge these out of our hearts with a merciless surgery. If the intellectual equipment is deficient, the spiritual equipment is also far from perfect. Our leaders and our followers both require a deeper sadhana, a more direct communion with the Divine Guru and Captain of our movement, an inward uplifting, a grander and more impetuous force behind thought and deed. It has been driven home to us by experience after experience. That not in the strength of a raw unmoralised European enthusiasm shall we conquer. Indians, it is the spirituality of India, the sadhana of India, tapasya, jnanam, shakti that must make us free and great. And these great things of the East are ill rendered by their inferior English equivalents, discipline, philosophy, strength. Tapasya is more than discipline; it is the materialisation in ourselves by spiritual means of the divine energy creative, preservative and destructive. Jnanam is more than philosophy, it is the inspired and direct knowledge which comes of what our ancients called drishti, spiritual sight. Shakti is more than strength, it is the universal energy which moves the stars, made individual. It is the East that must conquer in India's uprising. It is the Yogin who must stand behind the political leader or manifest within him; Ramadas must be born in one body with Shivaji, Mazzini mingle with Cavour. The divorce of intellect and spirit, strength and purity may help a European revolution, but by a European strength we shall not conquer.

The movements of the last century failed because they were too purely intellectual and had not an enlightened heart behind them. Nationalism has striven to supply the deficiency; it has poured the inspirations of the heart into a swifter and more discerning intellectual activity. But Nationalism also has been defective; it has been Indian in sentiment and aspiration, European in practice and actuality. It has helped itself with the intellect, rejoicing in its own lightness, clearness, accuracy, shrewd insight, but it has not been sufficiently supported by inspired wisdom. It has attached itself to imaginations and idealisms, but has not learned to discern the deeper Truth and study the will of God. It has been driven by ardent and vehement emotions but was defective in clear will power and the pure energy that is greater and more impetuous than any passionate feeling. Either Nationalism will purify itself, learn a more sacred truth and command a diviner impulse, or it will have to abandon utterly its old body and get itself a new. The pressure of events seem to be pointing in the latter direction. But in either case defeat cannot be the end, victory must be the end.

In all the events of the last year and a half the voice of the divine Teacher can be heard crying to us, "Abandon that you may possess; do my will and know yourselves, purify yourselves, cease to follow your fancies." He that has ears, let him hear. Knowledge will not come without self-communion, without light from within,—not even the knowledge of the practical steps that can lead to success. Every step that is taken in the light of a lower wisdom will fail until the truth is driven home.

The work that was begun at Dakshineswar, is far from finished, it is not even understood. That which Vivekananda received and strove to develop, has not yet materialised. The truth of the future that Bijoy Goswami hid within himself, has not yet been revealed utterly to his disciples. A less discreet revelation prepares, a more concrete force manifests, but where it comes, when it comes, none knoweth.

Sj. AUROBINDO GHOSE.

We are greatly astonished to learn from the local Press that Sj. Aurobindo Ghose has disappeared from Calcutta and is now interviewing the Mahatmas in Tibet. We are ourselves unaware of this mysterious disappearance. As a matter of fact Sj. Aurobindo is in our midst and, if he is doing any astral business with Kuthmi or any of the other great Rishis, the fact is unknown to his other Koshas. Only as he requires perfect solitude and freedom from disturbance for his Sadhan for some time, his address being kept a strict secret. This is the only foundation for the remarkable rumour which the vigorous imagination of a local contemporary has set floating. For similar reasons he is unable to engage in journalistic works, and DHARMA has been entrusted to other hands.

AN APPEAL.

I am the printer of Karmayogin. Since my imprisonment as the printer of the now defunct Navasakti News Paper, which extended over a pretty long period of 10 months, my affairs have drifted into a hopeless confusion. After my release it took sometime to recover my strength and spirits and begin work again. The difficulty of my situation has been considerably increased by the necessity of having to marry a daughter who has almost exceeded her marriageable age from the Hindu point of view. Some kind friends have taken pity on me and secured a bridegroom for my girl. The marriage must somehow be performed in Baisakh next. As I am now living from hand to mouth and have hardly any credit to manage a loan I have been most reluctantly driven to appeal to the public who I hope will appreciate my situation and help me out of the difficulty. All contributions to be sent to the Manager Karmayogin, 4, Shampookur Lane, Cal.

PRIMARY EDUCATION.

Now that the Government has gently but firmly shown the folly of looking to it for any movement in the direction of primary education, the only course for the Indian people, is to consider what they themselves can unassisted do, most effectively, in the matter. We all know that the future depends, for us, on education. Not that industry and commerce are unimportant, but because all things are possible to the educated, and nothing whatever to the uneducated man. We know this. We know also that this education, to be of any avail, must extend through all degrees, from its lowest and humblest applications, up to the highest and most disinterested grades. We must have technical education and we must have also higher research, because technical education, without higher research, is a branch without a tree, a blossom without a root. We must have education of women, as well as education of men. We must have secular education, as well as religious. And, almost more important than any of these, we must have education of the people, and for this, we must depend upon ourselves.

Our civilisation has never been backward in bringing to the notice of the individual his responsibility to society. There is none so poor that he has never tried to feed the starving. From this time we must recognise the still greater urgency of giving knowledge. There is no other way of making the unity of our country effective. If one class of the people derive all their mental sustenance from one set of ideas, and the bulk of the population from something else, this unity, although certainly present, cannot easily be made effective. But if all the people talk the same language, learn to express themselves in the same way, to feed their realisation upon the same ideas, if all are trained and equipped to respond in the same way to the same forces, then our unity will stand self-demonstrated, unflinching. We shall have acquired national solidarity, and power of prompt and intelligent action. In this very fact, of universal education, the goal will have been attained, and none could succeed in turning us back.

Nor need we regret that we fall back, for this, upon our own strength. Education for the people is, in the first place, reading, writing, and arithmetic. As long as we carry the burden ourselves, there need be no juggling with the geographical distribution of languages. But for artificial intervention, Orissa, Bengal, and Behar might now have been talking a single tongue, using a single script, quoting from a great consolidated literature. We must do all we can, for the simplification of the language-problem, and for this, nothing could be so effective as our own feeble action, infinitely preferable to the centralised, mechanical organisation.

Another advantage in our own effort is, that it alone can be a permanent force. It depends upon no outside influence. Let the centralisers come and go, and change as they will, the initiative that resides in the nerve-ends themselves, remains intact, can never be infringed.

We have to build up this idea of the sacred duty of giving education to the people as one of the elements of our civilisation. Already we have the idea of giving alma. The one is only an extension of the other.

In most western countries, it is required that every young man, when his education is complete, shall give three, four, or five years to military service. He goes into barracks, is regimented, and drilled, makes a unit in the standing army, and passes out, usually, when his term is ended, an efficient soldier, to remain, for the rest of his life, ready at any moment to join in the armed defence of his country.

What we have to do, is in like fashion, to organise the army of education. Why should it be thought impossible that every student, when his own education is over, should be called upon to give three years to the people? It is of course understood that just as the only son of a widow is, in the west excused military service, so one whose earnings are absolutely necessary to others must be excused the educational service. The villagers, on the other hand, would easily maintain a single student, living amongst them as a schoolmaster. And when his own three years were over, it is to be supposed that he could, from his own old school or college, arrange for another to take his place. Some would learn to love the simple village life, and elect to live and die, poor schoolmasters. Most, however, would serve the years of their vow, and pass on, returning to the city, to bear their part in the life of a more complex community. On the one hand, the duty of teaching, on the other, the duty of maintaining, so teacher and taught make the perfect social unit. And so the great masses of the people might be swept within the circle of articulation. It takes thirty years to make a whole people literate, even supposing that an idea like this were carried out in its fulness. But with it we must not neglect the Asiatic device that makes every morsel of social service self-supporting, and self-propagating. India never forgets to wing the seed that she has brought to ripeness. Along with the teaching must go the awaking of responsibility for further teaching. "Alms to the teacher," and "Knowledge to the people," must be converse truths, taught at one and the same time.

No central organisation could arrange a scheme like this. Only by a common impulse of the people and the students themselves could it be made a reality. But it is not impossible. The initial thought comes, it is true, from the city, but once sent out, all depends upon the number of lives that can be laid upon its altar. All must always in the last resort depend upon this, the quantity and quality of human life that can be sacrificed to it. Without men's lives, no seed of the mind germinates. How many will give up comfort, place, opportunity, ease, even perhaps their whole life, for this, the elementary education of the Indian people?

A SYSTEM OF NATIONAL EDUCATION.

CHAPTER VII.

The training of the Mental Faculties.

The first qualities of the mind that have to be developed are those which can be grouped under observation. We notice some things, ignore others. Even of what we notice, we observe very little. A general perception of an object is all we usually carry away from a cursory half-attentive glance. A closer attention fixes its place, form, nature as distinct from its surroundings. Full concentration of the faculty of observation gives us all the knowledge that the three chief senses can gather about the object, or if we touch or taste, we may gather all that the five senses can tell us of its nature and properties. Those who make use of the sixth sense, the poet, the painter, the Yogin, can also gather much that is hidden from the ordinary observer. The scientist by investigation ascertains other facts open to a minuter observation. These are the components of the faculty of observation, and it is obvious that its basis is attention, which may be only close, or close and minute. We may gather much even from a passing glance at an object, if we have the habit of concentrating the attention and the habit of Satwic receptivity. The first thing the teacher has to do is to accustom the pupil to concentrate attention.

We may take the instance of a flower. Instead of looking casually at it and getting a casual impression of scent, form and colour, he should be encouraged to know the flower—to fix in his mind the exact shade, the peculiar glow, the precise intensity of the scent, the beauty of curve and design in the form. His touch should assure itself of the texture and its peculiarities. Next, the flower should be taken to pieces and its structure examined with the same careful fulness of observation. All this should be done not as a task, but as an object of interest by skilfully arranged questions suited to the learner which will draw him on to observe and investigate one thing after the other until he has almost unconsciously mastered the whole.

Memory and judgment are the next qualities that will be called upon, and they should be encouraged in the same unconscious way. The student should not be made to repeat the same lesson over again in order to remember it. That is a mechanical burdensome and unintelligent way of training the memory. A similar but different flower should be put in his hands and he should be encouraged to note it with the same care, but with the avowed object of noting the similarities and differences. By this practice daily repeated the memory will naturally be trained. Not only so, but the mental centres of comparison and contrast will be developed. The learner will begin to observe as a habit the similarities of things and their differences. The teacher should take every care to encourage the perfect growth of this faculty and habit. At the same time the laws of species and genus will begin to dawn on the mind and by a skilful following and leading of the young developing mind, the scientific habit, the scientific attitude and the fundamental facts of scientific knowledge may in a very short time be made part of its permanent equipment. The observation and comparison of flowers, leaves, plants, trees will lay the foundations of botanical knowledge without loading the mind with names and that dry set acquisition of informations which is the beginning of cramming and detested by the healthy human mind when it is fresh from nature and unspoiled by unnatural habits. In the same way by the observation of the stars astronomy, by the observation of the earth, stones etc. geology, by the observation of insects and animals, entomology and zoology may be founded. A little later chemistry may be started by interesting observation of experiments without any formal teaching or heaping on the mind of formulas and book knowledge. There is no scientific subject the perfect and natural mastery of which cannot be prepared in early childhood by this training of the faculties to observe, compare, remember and judge various classes of objects. It can be done easily and attended with a supreme and absorbing interest in the mind of the student. Once the taste is created, the boy can be trusted to follow it up with all the enthusiasm of youth in his leisure hours. This will prevent the necessity at a later age of teaching him everything in class.

The Judgment will naturally be trained along with the other faculties. At every step the boy will have to decide what is the right idea, measurement, appreciation of colour, sound, scent, etc. and what is wrong. Often the judgments and distinctions made will have to be exceedingly subtle, and delicate. At first many errors will be made, but the learner should be taught to trust his judgment without being attached to its results. It will be found that the judgment will soon begin to respond to the calls made on it, clear itself of all errors and begin to judge correctly and minutely. The best way is to accustom the boy to compare his judgments with those of others. When he is wrong, it should at first be pointed out to him how far he was right and why he went wrong, afterwards he should be encouraged to note these things for himself.

If you are really after the best thing in the market use THE ORIENTAL FACTORY'S SOAPS.

They are talk of the day, the pride of the Swadeshi, have the largest of all Sales. Keep the Skin best. Are the cheapest for the value, and available every where.

THE ORIENTAL SOAP FACTORY

GOABAGAN, CALCUTTA. Tel Address :—"KOWSTOVE."

Every time he is right, his attention should be prominently and encouragingly called to it so that he may get confidence.

While engaged in comparing and contrasting, another centre is certain to develop, the centre of analogy. The learner will inevitably draw analogies and argue from like to like. He should be encouraged to use this faculty while noticing its limitations and errors. In this way he will be trained to form the habit of correct analogy, which is an indispensable aid in the acquisition of knowledge.

The one faculty we have omitted, apart from the faculty of direct reasoning, is Imagination. This is a most important and indispensable instrument. It may be divided into three functions, the forming of mental images, the power of creating thoughts, images and imitations or new combinations of existing thoughts and images, the appreciation of the soul in things, beauty, charm, greatness, hidden suggestiveness, the emotion and spiritual life that pervades the world. This is in every way, as important as the training of the faculties which observe and compare outward things. But I shall deal with it in a subsequent chapter.

The mental faculties should first be exercised on things, afterwards on words and ideas. Our dealings with language are much too perfunctory and the absence of a fine sense for words impoverishes the intellect and limits the fineness and truth of its operations. The mind should be accustomed first to notice the word thoroughly its form, sound, sense; then to compare the form with other similar forms in the points of similarity and difference, thus forming the foundation of the grammatical sense; then to distinguish between the fine shades of sense of similar words and the formation and rhythm of different sentences, thus the formation of the literary and the syntactical faculties. All this should be done informally drawing on the curiosity and interest, avoiding set teaching and memorising of rules. The true knowledge takes its base on things, artha, and only when it has mastered the thing, proceeds to formalize its information.

CONVERSATIONS OF THE DEAD.

GANDHARI AND DHRITARASHTRA.

Gandhari: Awake! Awake! We are called again to the play. The players wait. The drama cannot go forward until we are found. They are so earnest, those already on the stage! How can we keep them at the pause?

Dhritarashtra: So earnest, yes! There they are, the nannikins, striding up and down the stage prating about ideals, and calling aloud to heaven about their rights and duties! Their right to do this duty, their duty to claim that right! Ugh! Ugh! Ugh! The whole thing is a tempest in a cow-puddle. How much sweeter were harmony and concord without all this talk of rights and duties! Can they not see that the whole thing is Maya, anyway, that the stars are very distant, and the earth is wide, and it matters little who wins or who loses in these mimic battles?

Gandhari: Ah no, my Lord, you look with the outer eye, alone. To see thus is to be oneself beneath the spell of Maya. The idleness of uncertainty is not the same as victorious insight! I also look, but with that inner sense that your wife gained. And I say, let them strive and struggle with all their might! Let them wrestle to their utmost! Let them fight, with teeth set, and grim determination, though they were even less than five to a hundred men! Unless they can win, in this contest of the play-house, they are lost, lost, for time and for eternity!

Dhritarashtra: Yet you were never a turbulent woman, Gandhari! By your side found I ever a refuge, in days when our sons and their foes kept the whole world at fever-pitch without. How can it be that you, sweetest of women, and ideal of wifehood, would fill the stage of our time with violence, would welcome warfare and the din of battle, would call down confusion and bloodshed, from which even men may shrink with fear and horror?

Gandhari: Can you not see, dear Sovereign and Spouse, the next act in our play is all of this? Man sees only the external, the superficial. But woman everywhere looks deeper, and interprets, urges, and inspires. Man sees only the results of the fight, and has little heart to pay again so great a price to gain so little; but woman sees the heroes themselves, and thinks even defeat were nothing, to give for such?

Dhritarashtra: Tell me, my wife, what is it that you see? I shall talk no more of life being all a dream, talk no more of the sweetness of peace. Here is indeed the spell of Maya, to use even the highest of thoughts, only to justify one's own comfort and retirement. But utter to me your prophecy, that I may go down to the great drama with heart at rest, making my right arm serve your sight ! I am silent. I await in you the voice of vision.

Gandhari : (with head bent forward, eyes fixed and unseeing. She is at first silent, then her voice rises gradually, in a low, plaintive chant).

Dreams ! Dreams ! The past is hidden like a dream, beneath the clouds of time. Gone is the age of our sorrow. Gone is the kingdom of Yudisthira. Great are the changes on the earth we loved. The play has grown sad. The players are old, and bent, and weary. The music is now so low that I can scarce'y hear it. The Lokhi puja is feeble and small * * * Yet still I see, in simple hearts, burns the light of faith ! Villagers, seated beneath the tree at night-fall, whisper together of the coming again of Rama. The peasant, driving the oxen at the plough, mutters "Ram" "Ram" with every sigh. And listen ! listen ! what is the word I hear ? Dharma ! Dharma ! Joto Dharma ! Ah, Joto Dharma, stoto Joyha ! Stoto Joyha, indeed, Now, now I see ! * * * I see the battle of the souls. How many lights rise upwards and are lost in God ! Again awake the sounds of action among the players. Again take place the great renunciations. Men are become strenuous once more.

They think great thoughts, and attempt impossible tasks. They laugh at words like loss and death. They toss lightly aside the notion of defeat. To the heroes, they say, whether victory or defeat is only a question of the fortunes of war. Today this. To-morrow that. The lights are brighter. The music grows louder. Ah, good in my ears sounds the clang of shields and weapons, and the laughter of the heroes ! How gay and bright grows the play ! Ah Husband and King, how firm is my faith ! Arise, let us go forth upon the stage. Joto Dharma stoto Joyha.

CHITRANGADA.

In Manipur upon her orient hills
Chitrangada beheld intending dawn
Gaze coldly in. She understood the call.
The silence and imperfect pallor passed
Into her heart and in herself she grew Prescient of grey realities ; Rising,
She gazed afraid into the opening world.
Then Urjoon, felt his mighty clasp a void
Empty of her he loved and, through the grey
Unwilling darkness that disclosed her face, Sought out Chitrangada. "Why dost thou stand
In the grey light, like one from joy cast down ?
O thou whose bliss is sure. Leave that grey space,

Come hither." So she came and leaning down,
With that strange sorrow in her eyes, replied :
Great, doubtless, is thy love, thy very sleep
Impatient of this brief divorce. And yet
How easily that void will soon be filled !
For thou wilt run thy splendid fiery race
Through cities and through regions like a star.
Men's worship, women's hearts inevitably
Will turn to follow for, as the planets move Unbidden round the sun. Thou wilt accept them,

Careless in thy heroic strength and beauty,
And smile securely kind, even as a God
Might draw an earthly maiden to his arms
And marry his immortal mouth to hers.
Then wilt thy destiny seize thee, thou wilt pass
Like a great light in heaven and leave behind
Only a memory of force and fire.
No lesser occupation can for ever
Keep thee, O hero, whose terrestrial birth
Heaven fostered with her seed,—for what but this
To fill thy soul with battle, and angust
Misfortunes and majestic harms embrace
And joys to their own nature, orated. List,
Empire shall meet thee on some mighty field
Disputing thee with death. Thou art not ours
More than the wind that lingers for a while
To touch our hair, then passes to its home."
And Urjoon silently caressing her,

"Muse not again, beloved Chitrangada,
Alone beside the window looking out
On the half-formed aspect and shape of things
Before sunlight was made. For God still keeps Near to a paler world the hour ere dawn
And one who looks out from the happy, warm
And mortal limit of mankind that live
Enhoused, defended by companionship
With walls and limitations, is outdrawn
To dateless memories he cannot grasp
And infinite yearnings without form, until
The sense of an original vastness grows,
Empty of joyous detail, desolate,
In labour of a wide and unfinished world.
Look not into that solemn silence ! Rather Protect thyself with joy, take in my arms Refuge from the grey summons and defend Thy soul until God rises with the sun.
Friendly to mortals in the living sun's
Great brilliant light, friendly the cheerful noise
Of earth rising to her various tasks
And myriad hopes. But this grey hour was born
For the ascetic in his silent cave
And for the dying man whose heart released Loosens its vibrant strings." She answered him :

"Near to the quiet truth of things we stand
In this grey moment. Neither happy light
Nor joyful sound deceives the listening heart,
Nor Night in arms, the Mother brooding, vast,
To comfort us with sleep. It helps me not To bind thee for a moment to my joy.
The impulse of thy mighty life will come Upon thee like a wind and drive thee forth
To toil and battle and disastrous deeds
And all the giant anguish that preserves
Our world. Thou art resistlessly wast born
To these things as the leopard sleek to strength
And beauty and fierceness, as resistlessly
As women are to love,—even though they know
Pain for the end, yet, knowing, still must love.
Ah, quickly pass ! Why shouldst thou linger here
Vainly ? How will it serve God's purpose in thee
To tarry soothing for her transient hour
Merely a woman's heart, meanwhile perhaps

Lose some great moment of thy life which once Neglected never can return." She paused
And great Urjoon made answer, deeply moved :
Has my clasp slackened or hast thou perceived
A waning passion in my kiss ? Much more
My soul needs thee than on that fated day
When through Bengal of the enormous streams
With careless horsehooves hurrying to the east
I came, a wandering prince, companioned only
By courage and my sword ; nor knew such flowers

Were by the wayside waiting to be plucked
As these darktresses and sweet body small
Of white Chitrangada. Dost thou remember ?

O fair young sovereign ruling with pure eyes
And little fearless hand fragile and mild
This strong and savage nation! Didst thou know ?
Didst thou expect me in thy soul ? Assuredly
Thy heart's first flutterings recognised their lord.
And never with such gladness mountain queen
Exchanged tremendous seat and austere powers,
Her noble ancient right, for only leave
To lay her head upon my feet and wear
My kisses, not that crown. Content with love
All else thou gavest. Now thou speakest sadly, Too like a mind matured by thought and pain."

To be continued.

RAJKUMARI LEPER ASYLUM. DEOGHUR.

The town of Deoghur being the seat of Baidyanath, the presiding deity of Hindu medical science, among other incurable sufferers, a large number of lepers has all along been noticed throughout the year to come over here from the different parts of the country with a strong expectancy of relief by the mysterious grace of the divine healer. Before the establishment of this asylum the condition of these miserable wretches was really pitiable during their stay at this place. There having been no provision whatever for their shelter and food they had to pass their days on public streets and in the open compound of the temple and to depend for their sustenance upon the casual charity of the generous public.
For this reason their painful life was rendered doubly miserable. Their pitiable condition excited sympathy, among others, of men like the late Pandit Girijananda Jha, the late Sreejuti Rajnarayan Basu and Sreejuti Jogendranath Basu. These kind-hearted gentlemen set together to devise means for affording substantial relief of a permanent nature to these homeless and helpless lepers.

At the same time the danger to which public health was every moment exposed in consequence of the possibility of occasional contact with these lepers did not escape their vigilant attention and to avert it was the secondary object of their anticipated measure. Unfortunately little could be done for want of funds.
Just at that moment our eminent countryman the late Dr. Mohendralal Sircar came forward with a handsome offer of Ra. 5,000 for the construction of a building to accommodate the lepers. Thus encouraged, these gentlemen proceeded to invite subscription from the public in aid of an asylum for lepers. Being successful in their efforts to a certain extent they invited Sir Charles Elliott, the then Lieutenant-Governor of Bengal, to lay the foundation stone of the present asylum named after the wife of the generous doctor, which ceremony took place on the 12th July, 1892. Subsequently the asylum was formally opened on the 25th August, 1895. It was started with a fund amounting to nearly Ra. 8,000 and a managing committee to look after its interests. From the very beginning Sreejuti Jogendranath Basu acted as its honorary secretary. Having rendered disinterested service in this capacity for nearly five years and a half when in January, 1901, he made over charge of his duties, he had been able to leave a sum of Ra. 19,300 in the fund of the asylum. This happy result was due mainly to his untiring exertion towards this noble cause. Since then Rai Bahadur Barada Prasada Basu Deva Varmana, retired executive engineer, has been performing the duties of the honorary secretary of the asylum. Under his careful supervision the fund of the asylum has further received an addition raising it to the sum of nearly Ra. 22,180. The management of the asylum is at present vested in a Trust Committee consisting of 18 members among whom are included the local Deputy Commissioner, the Sub-divisional Officer, the Deputy Magistrate and other respectable gentlemen of the place. This Committee was established in the year 1903. Last year the total income of the asylum amounted to Ra.

3,282, the total expenditure being Ra.
2,571. At the end of 1900 there were 15 lepers in the asylum. During the last nine years ending with 1909 some 429 lepers received admission into the asylum out of whom 199 left the asylum cured of sores, 171 left incurable, 32 died, leaving 49 the number of the present inmates.
Here lepers are treated according to the principles of Homoeopathy. On a perusal of its annual reports it is observed with much satisfaction that through the unselfish efforts of some kindly disposed gentlemen subscription is regularly raised from the Simla offices which is annually sent in aid of the asylum. Last year the sum realised from this source amounted to Ra. 577. In the year 1907 the Government of Bengal made a grant of Ra. 2,500 towards the support of the asylum. The Government have also held out a promise to the effect that they will make a further grant, viz., twice the amount to be raised by public subscription in excess of the above grant. That is, if the sum of
Ra. 3,000 is raised by public subscription Government will offer Ra. 1,000 ; if 4,000 the Government offer will be raised to
Ra. 3,000 and so on.

There can be no difference of opinions as regards the usefulness of this institution. The total number of lepers in United Bengal is 27,400, and the number of leper asylums established in this province is 10 or 11, where regular arrangement exists for the maintenance of nearly 1,650 lepers only. Of these asylums seven are under the kind and careful supervision of Christian missionaries, the number of their inmates being 1,300. By this, as well as other acts of charity truly becoming the noble religion which they profess, they have placed our country under an eternal obligation. There is one asylum with 800 inmates under the direct management of the Government. While under the supervision of our own countrymen we can count only one or two asylums which make provision for nearly 50 lepers only. From the above statement it is clearly evident that here, as in other spheres of our activity, the discharge of only a very small portion of our public duty is due to our own exertion. So long as a single helpless leper, solicited of redress at our hand, is left uncared and unprovided for, we are not justified in adopting the attitude of indifference which so prominently characterises our conduct so far as this question is concerned. No amount of excuse will exonerate us from the responsibility which both religion and morality enjoin upon us.

Thus a very spacious field of disinterested and really beneficial work lies extended before us and is waiting for our sympathy and exertion for its consummation. A humble suggestion as to how this task can be successfully accomplished is placed before the public for their kind consideration. In the Simla hills, the seat of the Imperial Government, in most of the offices kind-hearted gentlemen out of their own free will, take upon themselves the task of collecting subscriptions in aid of the inmates of the asylum in question. The amount thus collected in each office is deposited with a gentleman, who is thus enabled to transmit the whole amount to the secretary of the asylum every year. Is not action on a similar line feasible also in other Government and mercantile offices? Will not the members of the legal, medical and engineering profession, when respectfully approached, show their readiness to associate themselves with this work? Is it not natural to expect substantial contribution from several commercial centres whose charity in deserving cases is a well-established fact? Need we fear that in such places unselfish workers will not be forthcoming for this noble undertaking? It is our firm conviction that in every sphere of human activity it will not be difficult to come across persons favourably disposed towards work of this nature. It is only necessary to suitably place before them the object under our consideration. Thus with the sympathy and support of our fellow brethren in different spheres, will it not be possible to start a provincial leper asylum and for this purpose cannot the Rajkumari Leper Asylum be utilised as a central institution? In these auspicious days of national self-consciousness, supplemented by organised activity in every direction, will it be inconsistent with the spirit of the time to cherish such an idea in our hearts?

In every undertaking of appreciable magnitude the greatest difficulty that generally stands in the way is invariably experienced in the incipient stage. But fortunately in this respect owing to the exertion of our revered countrymen mentioned above the line seems clear and the passage comparatively smooth and easy-going. The successful execution of this undertaking promises threefold blessings:—

(1) Relief of the sufferings of helpless lepers.

(2) Prevention of the dangers of infection to which public health is at present exposed.

(3) Prevention of helpless lepers from renouncing their religion and embracing Christianity under the sympathetic influence of Christian missionaries.

The object of this representation is to appeal quality of public mercy—the quality that is not strained, upon which depends entirely the fulfilment of such a task, the one and only aim of which is to redress the sufferings of those of our helpless and wretched brethren to whom the hope of recovery never comes in life that comes to all. Does it not then behove us to offer our mites to assuage their lifelong woe-begone lot, to provide what palliative we can? The mighty prophet of Arabia said: "One-tenth of every man's property is due to the poor." Were this noble dictum intelligently acted upon, how many of our dark and dismal corners would have been illumined?

To make the movement free from the slightest taint of doubt or suspicion it is highly desirable that those commanding public respect and confidence should kindly take the responsibility of collecting whatever may be voluntarily advanced in this connection.

Beeghur.

DR. COOMARSWAMY ON MR. HAVELL'S PAPER ON INDIAN ART.

In the discussion on Mr. Havell's paper on Indian art read before the Indian section of the Royal Society of Arts which was published in the last two issues of our paper. Dr. COOMARSWAMY said that he so fully agreed with Mr. Havell's argument that there was little need for him to enlarge upon the same theme. He thought Mr. Havell had said rather too little than too much of the apathy of the British Government with regard to all matters connected with Indian art. No one going for the first time into the Indian section of the Museum at South Kensington was likely to come away with any enlarged feeling of respect for or any enlarged comprehension of, the expression of Indian thought and feeling in art. The Museum was rather an emporium of industrial art, valuable as far as it went, than an effective record of India's creative imagination. Then again, Colonel Hanna's large collection had just been allowed to go to America because the Indian Government were indifferent to, and ignorant of Indian art. As a smaller instance, he might cite the case of some small bronze replicas of a seventh or eighth century Buddhist image which he had lately had made; these had been purchased by several Continental museums, but refused at once by the two great museums in London, including the Indian Museum already referred to. At South Kensington, moreover, there was not a single Mogul or mediæval Indian painting of the first rank. It was the same in India. At the Bombay School of Art, where students might be observed making shadings from antique casts, and drawings of Gothic or pseudo-classic architecture, there was not a single good specimen of mediæval Indian painting or sculpture; and so far as painting was concerned, the same was true of the Madras Museum and School of Art. The same attitude was traceable in the whole of the Government educational policy, in which Indian art and music were alike calmly and totally ignored. Take only one example, the teaching of drawing; no one had thought of studying indigenous methods, or of making use of them; antiquated South Kensington copy books represented the wisdom of the West in this respect for the greater part of India even now. The main difficulty seemed to be that English educationists in India could not be brought to realise their own colossal ignorance. It seemed as if the English and Anglo-Indian mind were not only indifferent to, and ignorant of Indian art and music, but determined that Indians themselves should remain in equal ignorance. He would also like to say a word with regard to the qualifications of European writers on Indian art. These were usually archaeologists or amateurs. Out of sympathy with the fundamental ideals of Indian thought, prejudiced in some cases against Indian religion, and possessed of few of the faculties of appreciation which are demanded of a writer on European art, they have found it most easy to condemn and criticise, and have felt little or no consciousness of their duty to interpret. The writer of books on art should aim to make his readers understand the art; to see the world as the artist saw it; at least, to know what the artist wished to say. Most writers on Indian art, in pointing out defects and limitations, have merely pointed out the obvious, and demonstrated the divergence of their own from the Indian point of view; and the results could not be regarded as permanent contributions to the history of art. The European critic never seemed to penetrate behind the surface of an Indian sculpture and painting, or to have learnt its language; he did not perceive its intention, and, therefore, could not judge it on the only true basis, that of Leonardo's saying, that "that drawing is best which best expresses the passion that animates the figure." The writers he referred to did not know, and could not feel the passion that animates many an Indian work of art; how then could they interpret or criticise? Which was not to say that their works had no value as records of historical fact; it merely showed that those who write, and those who accept such ideas, were not competent—as the Moguls or the Hindu rulers of India once were—to guide the art administration of the Government. The speaker was glad, as an Indian, to welcome Mr. Havell's work as the beginning of a new order of things, and though the study of Indian art could hardly said to have well begun, there were signs that it would in the future progress more rapidly, and be pursued more intelligently than had hitherto been the case. With regard to Sir George Birdwood's theory that fine art did not exist in India, this appeared to be only a question of terminology; the distinction of fine and decorative art was artificial, and though quite modern, we had progressed some little way even since the time when it was accepted as a matter of course. He could only say that if Sir George Birdwood chose to call the art of the Royal Academy or the Paris Salon, "fine," and such figure as the Avalokitevara of Mr. Havell's book (Plate XI), "decorative," then he preferred decorative to fine art, and regarded the decorative as a profounder revelation, a more living utterance than the fine. Sir George Birdwood appeared to think that "Fine Art" did not exist in Europe before the time of Raphael. He made the great mistake, common to all European art critics, of calling ideal art, "merely decorative," just because it was not "realistic." To say, in this way, that the use of definite "form," such as the canons prescribed, removed a given work from the category of fine art, was very much like saying that the use of sonnet form, or any other definite speech-mould, prevented our regarding a given poet's work as great or free! In any case it must be understood that the new consciousness of the "Nature of Indian" which lay behind the outward evidences of Indian nationalism, would be quite indifferent to academic terminology applied by Europeans to the products of Indian imagination, and would demand from the British Government a recognition of the artistic as well as of every other phase of Indian culture. The British Government would be harshly judged by future generations for its philistine and ignorant indifference to Indian art and artists, and its policy would be unfavourably contrasted with that of the Hindu and Mogul rulers of the earlier, and in many respects, more cultured times. Not only did the speaker think, however, that it was the duty of the Government in India and Ceylon at least, to continue the enlightened, art policy of the Indian rulers whom they supplanted, but he was convinced that nothing was more needed in European art than the liberating and inspiring influence of Oriental, and especially of Indian, art. He thought that influence was already felt. He would not enlarge upon this point, but would be very glad if the Chairman would call on Mr. Rothenstein, who was present, to speak as a practising artist, on the significance of Indian art, in India and in Europe.

MR. W. ROTHENSTEIN ON THE SIGNIFICANCE OF INDIAN ART.

Mr. W. ROTHENSTEIN, as a practising artist in the West, felt that if artists had only realised earlier in their Western art the value of Eastern ideas, Western art would have had an entirely different character. Signs were apparent indicating that what the author and others had been insisting on were already being felt in Western art. There was already a turn to the more abstract form of reality. It was beginning to be understood that reality and realism were not the same thing, and that the essence of art was reality. It was against that particular form of realism, which had since the Renaissance taken too large a part in Western art, that stimulation could be found in the study of everything Eastern. It was only just and right that the character of Indian art should be fully recognised, and even exaggerated, if it were possible to exaggerate it, since it had been so neglected for whole centuries at least of learned archaeological civilisation. He thought artists owed a very great debt of gratitude to the author for laying down with such enthusiasm and clearness what he considered to be the side of Eastern art from which all could learn.

HEWITT ON THE EARLY MERCHANT CIVILIZATION OF THE DRAVIDIAN BHARATAS.

The closing scenes of the Mahabharata add farther proof that it is an allegorical history of India, during the ages between the first entry into the country in the Neolithic age of northern races, who brought with them the sesame oil fax, millet and corn crops of Asia Minor and the final disruption at the close of the Bronze age of the empire of the peaceful trading classes formed by the union of the northern and indigenous tribes.

The history of this period, which was comprised in the original narrative forming the nucleus of the poem, has been translated into Sanskrit, from the original Dravidian language of these national symbolic histories from which its contents were derived, and edited and re-edited by many generations of Sanskrit-speaking bardic poets, who succeeded the national historiographers. The object aimed at by the original author of the final form of the poem, who grouped together the picture of the events which made the history of these ages of progress vitally important to the nation, was apparently to paint in his panoramic narrative a vivid consecutive dramatic history. The successive acts of the drama were represented as following one another in an ideal year of eighteen months or cantos and culminating in the rule of a new and righteous race which had been moulded into a nation in India, whose ideal form of Government was that established by the Pandavas under Yudhishtira, when they were elected Kings by the celebration of the national Rajanya sacrifice. This was overthrown by the irruption and revolt of the warlike Kauravas, sons of the black horse of the north. It was then that the rule of India fell into the hands of mixed race, the Khali or Mitties of Indian history, who adopting the moral teaching of the first Jain leaders, substituted a system of education based on individual self-improvement for the communal ethics of the earlier ages. The votaries of the various forms of the new creed and the artisans practicing the various trades which grew up as wealth and industry increased, grouped themselves into new associations separating themselves in a greater or less degree, from the caste or communal ethics of the earlier ages. The votaries of the various forms of this new creed and the artisans, practicing the various trade which grew up as wealth and industry increased, grouped themselves into new associations, separating themselves, in a greater or less degree, from the caste or communal village unions, founded on supposed identity of descent, and from the first trading caste, which were groups united by community of function. It was these extra caste associations which promoted the extraordinarily active religious movement which produced the first forms of the Buddhist and Zoroastrian reformations.

The individualism engendered by the new creeds produced a state of society which differed greatly from that existing in the days when all were trained to follow the rules of conduct and the teachings inculcated by the Leaders of their village, their tribe and their family. When men began to think for themselves, to listen to others who opened out new views, to make experiment and thus invent and learn new trades, leading to the accumulation of wealth, the dawn of a new age began in which the leading section of society were divided into trade guilds, which still maintained over their members a system of disciplinary rules learned from the earlier village institutions, but who, though they retained the bulk of the trade profits in the coffers of the guild, yet encouraged their members to think, scheme, and emulate one another in promoting the advantage of the corporate body to which they belonged while all the guilds worked together with the view of making their commercial policy benefit all engaged in it, and of discouraging methods of working which different trades competing rivals and not partners, seeking as their principal object, the common good. Under this system war was regarded as an evil, and the united efforts of all the ruling powers to promote active and remunerative trade, without the disturbances of military quarrels, produced an age of Universal peace and prosperity, which is represented in Indian history by the eighteen months year of the Pandavas; and in considering the causes which culminated in this result it must not be forgotten that Indian society in its initial agricultural stages was essentially peaceful and that neighbouring villages did not quarrel, but that each cultivated its own fields and arranged its own affairs without interfering with those adjoining them, and that the strict attention paid to the ascertainment and record of village boundaries preserved by the Gonds, votaries and Gaurit priests of the boundary snake-God Goraya removed the principal cause of agricultural quarrel. It was the Takkas and Kauravas who formed the bulk of the warrior invaders of the North who first introduced the elements of strife into the country, and it was when these were overcome under the new government instituted by the Pandavas that the people gladly resumed the former peaceful course of existence which had been disturbed by the northern intruders.

It was this peaceful society of traders which was broken up by the northern Celto-Gothic Sanskrit speaking invaders, who in the beginning of the Iron Age conquered the country and introduced the Vedic Sanskrit rule which succeeded that of the Dravidian Bharatas.

The whole evidence shows with a very near approach to certainty that the only Bharata speech of northern India was some dialectical form of Dravidian Gondi such as the Dravidian Brahui spoken in Baluchistan.

And this conclusion is corroborated by the constant use in Sanskrit of the Dravidian cerebral letters C ch d dh and t, which are absent from all other Indo-European languages except Sanskrit, Bactrian and Zend in which the Zendvesta was written and and Pustu the speech of the Afghans. These letters were introduced into the Vedic Sanskrit dialects and languages derived from it by the children of Dravidian speaking mothers whose fathers belonged to the conquering Sanskrit race.

It was owing to this amalgamation of the Bharata people with the Sanskrit-speaking invaders that we find the ancient traditions, ritual and customs of pre-Sanskrit India preserved in the Rigveda.

Mahabharata, Haribansa, the Puranas, Ramayana, and the Jataka or birth stories forming one of the Buddhist canonical books. And these last include those telling the traditional history of the successive births assigned to Sidhartha Gautama, whose learning, preaching and organising abilities amalgamated into one belief the new religious views framed during thousands of years by the reforming teachers, and of which the Bhagabat Gita of the Mahabharata, one of the most impressive religious poems of the world, is a conspicuous example. And it was from the material supplied by the national storehouses of earliest thought and remembered history that the great Buddhist Teacher Sidhartha Gautama and his trained disciples framed the authoritative theology of the Buddhist Tripitaka which was so widely disseminated by its enthusiastic missionary preachers as to lead to the installation by Asoka, about 250 B.C. of Buddhism as the creed of the Indian Empire from whence it made its way to Ceylon, Burma, China and Japan and became the dominant religion of Eastern Asia.

AHMED RIZA'S SPEECH TO THE TURKISH PARLIAMENT

On his re-election as President, Ahmed Riza Bey addressed the Chamber. After thanking the Sultan for the new place of meeting* he had put at their disposal, and recommending the Deputies always to act with steady moderation and prudence, he continued thus:—

"Resolutions and laws should be entirely in agreement with the needs of the fatherland and traditions of the nation, so that they may be easily applied and put in execution, according to the aptitudes and character of the country. So, before making laws or amending them, we must prepare the necessary measures for their execution, to the end that all sections of the people may gain an equal advantage from them. The Government charged to apply the laws must find at home and abroad a more solid support than the wishes and the confidence of the Parliament. Let us recognise that the main support is in the religious sentiments, the morality, the customs and the education of the people. Progress and civilisation are like a car impelled by the force of the past. If it has not behind it the strong stimulus of forces both moral and material it stops in its ascent, or even falls back.

"The acts and efforts of the Parliament and the Government since the proclamation of the constitution not having yet had their full effect, they are thought to be few and unimportant. Trifling errors are magnified. The people considers evil the good which it does not at once understand, the acts which do not immediately procure material advantages, or the results which bring some prejudice to private interests, however beneficial to the community. Nevertheless, this popular view should not really trouble us. Reforms which suddenly change the people's way of life are often injurious. The law of evolution requires that transformations should be effected gradually. To-day it is not only our duty, but that of all Ottomans, to work hand in hand for the progress of our country. We must avoid the feelings which would lead us systematically and in hostile spirit to search for mutual cause of offence. Although criticism and condemnation are rights and gifts accorded by liberty, on condition that they are used well, it is also a virtue worthy of honour by a truly free and pure conscience, not to see only the bad side of everything, and not to give unlimited credence to all that is said.

"My dear colleagues, my aim in repeating truths which you already know is to express to you my desire as to the opinion which this year should predominate in the Chamber. When you made me President for the first time I considered this sign of confidence as a recompense for a struggle of twenty years against a despotic Government, which recognised neither justice nor legality. We have worked together during eight months. You have seen me at close quarters. Taking account of my inexperience, you have, during this interval, passed over some involuntary errors, and have again judged me worthy of this office. It would be on my part gross ingratitude to abuse, even unconsciously, the favour and confidence you have bestowed on me. The authority you give to the President is very important, but to employ it is a task of great delicacy. I find that its usefulness and its efficacy depend especially on impartiality—(applause)—and I know that I can only maintain and preserve the credit and dignity of this office by neutrality. For I am proud to be, not the President of a party, but the President of the whole Chamber. (Prolonged applause.) Your kindness and my goodwill I hope will establish complete harmony in the bosom of the Assembly. My brothers, I wish from the bottom of my heart that our sacred fatherland may benefit by this concord and this harmony. (Three rounds of applause.)—Translated from the Stamboul, November 16, 1908.

MISS. H. M. HOWSIN ON THE SIGNIFICANCE OF INDIAN NATIONALISM.

Miss H. M. Howsin has written a pamphlet entitled "The Significance of Indian Nationalism" (A. C. Fifield, m. net. 89 p.p.), to which Dr. Rutherford has contributed an Introductory Note. Miss Howsin lays a firm foundation for her recommendations by a sketch of the history of the country both in its political and intellectual aspects; she defends the educated classes from the charge of ignoring the interests of the mass of their fellow-countrymen; and she deals with the relations of the Hindu and Mahomedan communities. She sums up her view in these words:—

"It is because of these considerations that the character of a foreign rule does not affect that question of nationalism, which rests on the assumption that, when a nation has reached a certain stage, self-government from within, and not compulsion, however wise and benevolent, from without, is a natural and vital necessity of future growth; and if from any cause that nation fails to achieve the requisite measure of attainment, premature decay inevitably sets in."

S. N. SWINNY.

THE INDIAN RENAISSANCE.

In considering the present Indian unrest, it is not always remembered that it is the natural growth of the nation at the root of it. This nation-idea is not a mere importation from Europe, but essentially a natural native growth, to which the conditions created by British rule have made material contributions, but which owes its origin to that great Indian Renaissance which has followed the discovery of Sanskrit and the fruitful investigations into the culture and civilisation of India which this discovery directly led to. It is a part of the general awakening of Asia, which is rising up in a determined protest against the intellectual and moral, no less than the commercial and political, domination of Europe. It is already a mighty moral force in the country, visibly shaping and moulding, not simply people's political or economic ideals, but also their social life and laws, and which is even pressing the sacred symbols and mysteries of their religion into its service. Towering above the old rivalries of creeds and cults, there stands to-day a new creed in India, the creed of nationalism, and a new cult, the cult of the mother.

It is essentially an intellectual and spiritual upheaval, the forerunner of a mighty social revolution, with a new organ and a new philosophy of life behind it. It is the summing up of the long course of humanity through a reconstructed social and civic life in the light of a lofty spiritual philosophy. This is the inner meaning of the present ferment in India.

It represents the travail of a new birth—the birth of a rejuvenated India, preparing to enter the larger and saner life of a renovated humanity, which the new

Asiatic Renaissance is slowly leading to. The European Renaissance, to which modern world owes so much of its progress and enlightenment, has been exhausted. Humanity is on the threshold today of a new era and a new Renaissance, the inspiration of which is coming from the recovered thoughts and ideals of the long-neglected East.

PASSING THOUGHTS.

—ooo—

The Signs of a New Age.

The signs of a new age are about us in many directions. We are indeed growing so accustomed to the idea that we sometimes, possibly, anticipate too much. We talk too easily of a new age, forgetting that if we would indulge such thoughts we must be content to pay a high price for the privilege. Hence it may be well to stop a moment and take stock, as it were of the signs of the times, counting the cost once and again, to us and ours, of the course on which we have entered, reading the omens of the day that has just now dawned. The signs are not by any means all good. It is true, there is a new spirit abroad in the land. It is true that the young to-day have a much vaster and more complex notion of their duties than had their fathers before them. Changes come always from the young, and we need not apologise for the fact that it is these whom we have to take into account. In all countries the young are less exploited in the service of things as they are, than the old; and consequently they are more sensitive to the hint of new spiritual forces than others. In the west, it is true, society as a whole has specialised more or less in that particular group of ideas that are characteristic of the dawning era with us; hence in such matters the young are never un-led in Europe. Still, led or un-led, we are much mistaken if great initiative in any field ever comes from the old, and after all, the criterion of vitality, for races and for nations, must lie finally, not in the age of the rank and file, but in the question whether new ideas find a response among them, whether great causes go un-led, and whether there be sacrifice and enthusiasm enough to carry the weight of the banner, in the unending contest of humanity between 'has been' and 'is to be.'

Our Losses.

The future then lies always with the young. Always, in all countries. In this we have no reason to feel ashamed. But we must not shut our eyes to the fact that in our recent struggle for self-development we have netted some losses. Rights which had hitherto been left in our hands, liberties which had not hitherto been tampered with, are gone from us, and we are so much the poorer in means of work. On the other hand few signs of the times are more noteworthy than the attitude in which these losses have been met. In an earlier generation, the answer would have been a loud outcry and persistent agitation, for the repeal of this act and that. To-day, we hear nothing of the sort. Why? Simply because we are now convinced that our salvation lies with ourselves, and with no other, to work out. It is not politics, but constructive work and energy that now occupies the bulk of our attention. In itself, this is most significant. And what do we regard as constructive? Only that which proceeds on the assumption that all power is in ourselves; that India and the Indian people are ultimately the arbiters of their own destiny; that a nation is greater than its conditions, favourable or the reverse; that MAN, in fine, is all there is, the lord of his own fate, the expression of infinite power. Constructive work then is that which deals with man, first and foremost, believes in man, inspires him, and proceeds to tell him of his strength. This is the work which we humbly seek to do. And in this looking from the institution to the man behind the institution, we feel that we see one of the most impressive signs of the new age.

The New Day.

A day has risen in India when we look to ourselves alone. We refuse to spend time or energy in appealing to any but ourselves. We should despise the privilege we owed to anything but our own strength. Like the Krishna of our childhood, we enter our Mathura with all the forces of the world against us. Nor do we carry any extraneous aid. Neither steed nor weapon is ours, in this unequal contest. But is it really unequal? Surely not! Surely material and spiritual cannot be compared in potency! Was Kansa any match for Krishna? The ancient tales say not, and we believe the ancient tales speak true. We know well that the race-epics never die, for they eternally repeat themselves. And we live in a day when the thought is born that no day in the past was ever greater, a day that is minded to put to the test the truth of these tales of old, a day that is not content to believe that the age of miracles is past, a day that trusts to thought, and yet determines to re-make the world, a day of infinite ambition. Is it not true that a new age is born?

The Test.

But it is easy to work ourselves up into a fine frenzy of inspiration. Words are but words, and the question is of deeds. The cry is for lives, for toil, for achievement, for vows made and kept, for spirit and a sacrifice and courage. We want co-operation, fellow-feeling, public spirit, and the power that sees things in their true proportion, never mistaking the relative claims of the little and the great. The restoration of the national industries, and the establishment of some sort of national education are rightly felt to be the core of the task before us. With these, goes all the rest. Nor have we occasion to despair. In every battle there comes an hour, after the first victorious charge, when all seems to be in re-action. Those who are finally to win the day seem for the hour to be the losers. It is then found out by every fight worth his salt that even battles are won, not by impetuosity, but by steady work. In all human victories there is an element of worm-like toil. Perseverance is one of the greatest of economic assets. Even military life is not wholly a series of glorious dashes. Therefore we have nothing to give us a moment's uneasiness. On no account must we abate one jot of our swadeshi vow. For the rest, it is only our power of work that is being tested. The strength of our will to build and build and build again is being called in question. Let the mole and the ant and the earth-worm become our gods, but let there be no doubt about the answer. Can we? WE CAN.

THE UNITY OF INDIA.

—o—

There is no subject more germane to our aims and purposes, than the much mooted question of the unity of India. India is so disunited, say those who do not love her. And, India is one! answer her children and Bhaktas.

Let us, then, take the matter at its worst, and assume that the disunion and diversity of our Motherland is a fact. What is the line of thought that we ought in such a case to pursue? It is to be supposed that we do not wish to intensify the problem, but rather to solve it, to treat in such a way that it may grow less instead of greater, day by day. In the first place, it is open to us, to dwell on the many elements of unity which India already possesses. Her own civilisation, apart from foreign influences, is remarkably harmonious, throughout the length and breadth of the country. There is not even such diversity of language as people suppose. The old Motherland did not fail, amongst all the provisions that she made for her children, to evolve also for them a common tongue, more or less universal in the North, and well known as a language of culture in the South. If, again, we take up religion, it is difficult to see the acute diversity of which people talk. The whole theory of Hinduism is one of a vast accordance of faiths, and a scheme in which even Islam and Christianity, strongly individual as they are, may find places.

Let us, on the other hand, look at the problem with which other countries have to deal. Could Indian disunity be compared with that of America, or even England, who have to assimilate thousands of aliens every year? Could her linguistic variety be compared to that of Switzerland, when we remember the relative sizes of the two populations? German, French and Italian divide that little land amongst themselves, and this vast India is practically covered by Hindi with its variations, and certain Dravidian tongues, all linked together, as these are, by a common classic, and common social characteristics and ideas.

Unity is a thing of which it may be said that, whether it apparently exists or not, it must first of all be conceived of in the mind. All the greatest realities of life are primarily, in this way, concepts in the mind. They must afterwards be externalised, it is true, but their birth is in the mind. There they must first be recognised and shaped. There they must be asserted. From this, they become external. We all know how true this is of the relations of the family. Does the wife allow herself to argue the question of her husband's character and loveableness? This would soon destroy the most perfect of relations. But she dwells only on the facts that support her own devotion. The rest she ignores, as so much waste material. It is of no consequence to her.

Similarly, there is a very actual sense in which only the positive is true. Only the positive really exists. Just as, to the eye of affection only the sweet and beautiful has any real objective existence, so in many other things also, a like truth holds good. Harmony, and harmony alone is, in this sense, real, while discord and its elements are unreal. The whole of human society is built up along such lines as these. The passionate love of mothers for their children would soon be at an end, but for the great intensifying concept of the child's need and dependence which is read into every act and word, and makes the relationship firm and growing. In a parallel way, then, it may be said that only unity is true: that the opposite of unity is negative and therefore has no existence. It matters not what the senses report. Reality is conferred by the mind. The great life-giving concepts arise within and become apparent afterwards. We see that India is one and she is one, and shall be one. This thought, with the note of joy and strength, is the duty of every nationalist to hold.

A SYSTEM OF NATIONAL EDUCATION.

CHAPTER VIII.

—o—

THE TRAINING OF THE LOGICAL ACULTY

The training of the logical reason must necessarily follow the training of the faculties which collect the material on which the logical reason must work. Not only so but the mind must have some development of the faculty of dealing with words before it can deal successfully with ideas. The question is once this preliminary work is done, what is the best way of teaching the boy to think correctly from premises. For the logical reason cannot proceed without premises. It either infers from facts to a conclusion, or from previously formed conclusions to a fresh one, or from one fact to another. It either induces, deduces or simply infers. I see the sun rise day after day, I conclude or induce that it rises as a law daily after a varying interval of darkness. I have already ascertained that wherever there is smoke, there is fire. I have induced that general rule from an observation of facts. I deduce that in a particular case of smoke, there is a fire behind. I infer that a man must have let it from the improbability of any other cause under the particular circumstances. I cannot deduce it because fire is not always created by human kindling; it may be volcanic or caused by a stroke of lightning or the sparks from some kind of friction in the neighbourhood.

There are three elements necessary to correct reasoning, first, the correctness of the facts or conclusions I start from, secondly, the completeness as well as accuracy of the data I start from, thirdly, the elimination of other possible or impossible conclusions from the same facts. The fallibility of the logical reason is due partly to avoidable negligence and looseness in securing these conditions, partly to the difficulty of getting all the facts correct, still more to the difficulty of getting all the facts complete, most of all, to the extreme difficulty of eliminating all possible conclusions except the one which happens to be right. No fact is supposed to be more perfectly established than the universality of the law of gravitation as an imperative rule, yet a single new fact inconsistent with it would upset this supposed universality. And such facts exist. Nevertheless, by care and keenness the fallibility may be reduced to its minimum.

The usual practice is to train the logical reason by teaching the Science of Logic. This is an instance of the prevalent error by which book knowledge of a thing is made the object of study instead of the thing itself. The experience of reasoning and its errors should be given to the mind and it should be taught to observe how these work for itself;

it should proceed from the example to the rule and from the accumulating harmony of rules to the formal science of the subject, not from the formal science to the rule, and from the rule to the example.

The first step is to make the young mind interest itself in drawing inferences from the facts, tracing cause and effect. It should then be led on to notice its successes and its failures and the reason of the success and of the failure; the incorrectness of the fact started from, the haste in drawing conclusions from insufficient facts, the carelessness in accepting a conclusion which is improbable, little supported by the data or open to doubt, the indolence or prejudice which does not wish to consider other possible explanations or conclusions. In this way the mind can be trained to reason as correctly as the fallibility of human logic will allow, minimising the chance of error. The study of formal logic should be postponed to a late period when it can easily be mastered in a very brief period, since it will be only the systematising of the art perfectly well known to the student.

CONVERSATIONS OF THE DEAD.

Guru and Chelas in Pitrllok.

Guru; Pralaya is come! Pralaya is come! Upon the darkened earth draws down the cloud of confusion and doom. It is the twilight of the gods, the meeting-point of ages, into which is cast the past, out of which shall emerge the future. How strange that to the common world, seeing nothing but the objects of the senses, the present is as yesterday and to-morrow but an added day! Is there, in all the universe, another mingling of vision and blindness like that of man?

Chorus of Chelas:

"Power Thou art, give us power!
Thou art strong, give us strength!
Energy art Thou, give us energy!"

Guru. Here, amidst the psychic realities of Swarga, how impossible is it to darken the eyes! Almost one must weigh and measure the opposing forces. How hardly can one refuse to number and estimate the chances of victory. But the spiritual battle must be recognised. How sharp and burning blew the desert wind, but a moment ago, in the passage to earth of those ruthless spirits, whose lust of pride and power, at any cost to man, makes them like lights sombre of hue, burning in sulphurous atmospheres! How cool and sweet is the breath of this army of young souls, whose chanted prayers even now break in upon my reverie!

Chorus of Chelas:

"Energy art Thou, give us energy!
Oh make us strong, even as the thunder-bolt,
To keep our vow, of purity for life!"

Guru: Standing here on the inner side of the doors of birth, and watching the souls pass through, into the world, it is given to me to read each man's destiny in the great Pralaya. As the eyes of my own turn towards me, at the last. Ere he lifts the curtain and vanishes into earth-life, I see whether failure or success awaits him, on the battle-field of the spirit, and I give the ashirbad that will be his star of life. Failure or success! Ah, speed into the dusk of time, ye souls so bravely destined! And blessed be ye who shall be defeated! For ye also are mine! Ye above all need comforting! Yea, and ye shall yet conquer, in another age!

One amongst the chelas; Hush! Let us cease our praying and keep silence for a while! Surely the Guru called! I heard his voice! Listen! It comes again. Let us arise and go forth! The time is come! We come, Oh Lord! We come!

Guru to the first soul; Thou ardent soul, the first to hear my voice, thou goest forth into the night of life and time. Be strong. Keep ever this thy love. To thee will come the new. Test it. And when thou seest, think not it was thine. Make vision into deeds. Be faithful and endure.

To the second; Thou strong and steadfast sentinel! To thee I give the light within the heart. Let it shine far, in quiet faith, and light thy path with confidence serene. Men, it may be, will call thee great. Let not thine ears hear these, the voices of the crowd, lest thine hand slacken on the lamp it bears. These are the dreams of the sense-life alone. Look thou straight on, and be not drawn aside.

To the third; My playful child. Unspoilt thou dancest through thy days. Laughter and song are ever on thy lips. Fear is not known thee, nor ever shall be. Nay, even though the play of life be tragic, and in these acts draw to their close.

To all the souls: Oh ye great host of souls, beloved and blest, go forth! Plunge in the dusk! Revel ye in the doom! And from it wing your shining way to God! Ye herald souls go forth, and call a sleeping world to wake and live. Sentinel-souls, pass out, and stand ye firm! Guard ye your trust, and falter not, obey! Heroes and children, bards, armourers, and bearers of the light, go forth and strive! Be free of self! War with the hosts of evil night and day. Smite them and spare not, high of hand and will. Conquer the weakness in your hearts, and be men of a new great race, earth has not seen! Go forth! Go forth! And when the dream is done, return! I shall await ye at the doors of death! Pralaya, Pralaya is come. Fear not! Go forth!

AN APPEAL.

I am the printer of Karmayogin. Since my imprisonment as the printer of the now defunct Navasakti News Paper, which extended over a pretty long period of 10 months, my affairs have drifted into a hopeless confusion. After my release it took sometime to recover my strength and spirits and begin work again. The difficulty of my situation has been considerably increased by the necessity of having to marry a daughter who has almost exceeded her marriageable age from the Hindu point of view. Some kind friends have taken pity on me and secured a bridegroom for my girl. The marriage must somehow be performed in Baisakh next. As I am now living from hand to mouth and have hardly any credit to manage a loan I have been most reluctantly driven to appeal to the public who I hope, will appreciate my situation and help me out of the difficulty. All contributions to be sent to the Manager Karmayogin, 4, Shampookur Lane, Cal.

THOUGHTS AND COMMENTS.

(BY BIPIN CHANDRA PAI)

* SOCIOLOGY AS A SCIENCE.

Is Sociology a science; and if so, what are its data and methods? The question was raised by Mr. Frederick Harrison in his Presidential address to the Sociological Society. Mr. Harrison is the greatest apostle of the Comptean Creed of Humanity in England; and, as was to be expected, he approached the subject from the standpoint of that particular philosophy with which he is so completely identified. Comptean Positivism was an attempt to construct a philosophical and scientific basis for the dominant humanitarianism of the French Revolution. That humanitarianism lacked, however in two things; first it had no perception of the Divine, which is at once the cause and the explanation of the super-physical in mankind; and second, it had no perception of what we now know as race-consciousness. I, for one, fail to see how without these two fundamental conceptions, any Science of Sociology can be built up.

THE POSTULATES OF SCIENCE.

Science is systematised knowledge. It is, as Mr. Harrison himself says,—knowledge grouped and classified under a few large generalisations. Any knowledge or any group of knowledge is, therefore, not entitled to the position and dignity of science unless brought under some large generalisations. But the question arises, what are the bases of these generalisations? On the one hand, we have outside facts and phenomena; on the other, the observing mind. Science would be impossible in the absence of either of these two factors. But to some people, at least, the problem is pushed one step further. Is there, or is there not, a necessary relation between the outer facts and phenomena, and the observing mind? How does the mind claim to understand and interpret something that is not of itself? I do not know if Mr. Harrison denies the truth of the dictum that all knowledge is really self-knowledge; that we know things, not really as they are, but only and always as they impress us. In ordinary parlance, we make, no doubt, a distinction between impression and knowledge. But the distinction is one only of degree and not of kind: uncorroborated knowledge is called impression, corroborated impression we call knowledge. But how does this corroboration come? And even a more fundamental question is, what is the real value of this corroboration? Ten pairs of unaided eyes might, sitting on the veranda of a hospital, corroborate one another's testimony that green is yellow; would that establish the truth?

THE THEOLOGICAL STAGE.

We understand what is called the Theological Stage. We understand that in a certain low stage of intellectual evolution, man posits the arbitrary, lawless, personal will or whim or impulse of a supernatural being, behind every phenomenon. This theological stage is a fact, a matter of experience. We see it in little children. We read of it in the preserved records of the childhood of the race. We observe it in the primitive tribes of our own time. But this fact cannot be dismissed by simply putting a label on it. It demands an explanation. It presses for its meaning. The intellect is never satisfied with mere facts; explanations and interpretations of observed facts and phenomena are the necessary functions of the intellectual life. These are universal functions as much of the intellect of the child and the primitive man as of the adult and the civilised members of the race. This theological stage itself is a proof of it. It is the peculiar interpretation of common experience which people give, in this stage, that constitute the characteristic note of it. That interpretation is crude, granted. But what is your interpretation of Phenomena? That is the fundamental question. And a still more fundamental question is,—what are your credentials to claim the right of interpreting phenomena at all? These are fundamental problems, not of any particular science, but of all sciences.

GOD AND LAW.

The primitive man posits a person, essentially like himself, but infinitely superior to him in intelligence and strength, behind every phenomenon, which he cannot explain as the effect of a visible, personal, cause. To him even an animal is a person; indeed every thing that produces an effect is a person. The underlying generalisation of it all is what we call God.

Law or Principle of Causation. In the Theological Stage, the Cause is apprehended as personal, whether visible or invisible. In the Positive Stage, it is apprehended as impersonal,—as Law, which in itself is equally invisible, and is seen only in its operation. Is not this the fundamental difference between the two stages? What the theological man calls gods, or at a later stage, God, the Positivist-philosopher calls laws, and perhaps, ultimately, even Law, with a capital L.

But does it offer any satisfactory explanation of phenomena? And what is more fundamental, does it establish the title of the human mind to correctly understand phenomena and authoritatively interpret it? The projection of personality behind every phenomenon was undoubtedly crude and peevish; but it had, at least, this to be said in its favour that it gave an intelligible account of vents, an account which, whatever its inadequacy, was in any case such as the ordinary human mind could readily grasp. It at least posited some purpose behind every phenomenon. It felt the absolute necessity of attributing some aim which every phenomenon sought to reach, and as this purpose was difficult, at that stage of mental evolution, to conceive without a person, it posited a person at the back of whatever happened, from the regular rise and set of the sun, to the occasional but fearful convulsions of nature like an earth-quake or a tornado. The larger conception of Law has dispelled the crude notion of personal will as the origin of natural phenomena, but has it, at the same time, dissipated the idea of purpose also? On the contrary, is not purpose a very necessary and fundamental element of the concept Law?

THE IMPLICATIONS OF SCIENCE.

Law implies the adaptation of means to an end. It is the generalisation of certain relation observed in phenomena and tending to produce certain results. These relations are what may be called rational, that is they are capable of logical treatment, and their working may be reasonably predicted in the future, under the same conditions. And the investigation of these relations and the prediction of future results based upon past observations—all these imply a necessary correspondence between the modes of our intellect and the processes of outer phenomena.

From the stand-point of science the universe may be described as a huge mechanism. And there are two, and only persons who can interpret a mechanism, the person who makes it and the person who has the same intelligence and the same experience as the maker of the mechanism. The correct understanding of a mechanism is inconceivable under any other conditions. In saying this no theory of a creator and his creations is suggested, nor even any hypothesis of a personal godhead either. It would be premature to raise these issues, however fundamental they might seem to be to the theologian or the philosopher, at this stage of our enquiry. The present idea is simply to indicate the logical implication of science that whether personal, impersonal, or super-personal,—the Force or Law or by whatever other name you may call it,—that lies at the root and centre of the world-process, has a strange kinship with our own intelligence. This world-process is an intelligible process: this much at least science must admit in its own interest. But it could not be intelligible without having Intelligence as its originating and shaping principle. Whether the Intelligence that lies at the root and centre of the world-process is perfect or imperfect, whether it is benevolent, or malevolent, omnipotent or limited in its capacities, conditioned and controlled by other elements co-eternal and co-ordinate with itself,—these questions do not arise here, and should not be allowed to drive us away from the main track. The only proposition that seems absolutely valid here is that if the world-process be an intelligible process, that is something that can be studied and understood and rightly interpreted by the human intelligence, it must necessarily have a similar Intelligence at its root and centre. It is this cosmic Intelligence or cosmic Reason, or Cosmic Soul, which the ancients in India called Hiranyagarbha or Brahma,—that alone justifies scientific investigations, reveals scientific laws, and supports scientific generalisations.

THE MENTAL AND THE NATURAL ORDER.

The claims of science to correctly interpret phenomena, presuppose the capacity of the scientist to rightly apprehend the world-process. This is a fundamental postulate of science. But how does the scientist establish his title to this function? How can he read nature? That the human mind does rightly understand phenomena, is admitted. But those who work upon this assumption, do not always sift the rational grounds of it. The only conceivable explanation of it is that there is Something that is common between the human intelligence and what may be called cosmic intelligence. It is this Something that explains the necessary correspondence between the categories of the understanding and the processes of cosmic movement and evolution. There is, in other words, a Mental Order within the consciousness of every human being, and there is a Natural Order without him: both are subject to the same cosmic process. These two supplement each other, correspond to each other, and corroborate each other. This seems, to my mind, to be the very alphabet of all science.

THE COSMIC MIND.

Science implies, thus, a necessary relation between the mental and the natural order. The one is subjective, the other objective. The one supplies the forms of rational interpretation, the other furnishes the materials to be interpreted. Without these materials, the "forms" would be useless and inoperative: they might constitute the basis of abstract metaphysical investigations but could not develop science. Without the forms, the materials of the natural order would be meaningless and chaotic, incapable of rational study or intelligent interpretation. And this necessary correlation and correspondence between the subjective mental, and the objective natural order, upon which science works, demands, with equal necessity, some unifying and correlating principle, to form the logical ground of the relation between the mental and the natural order, making them both only two complementary aspects of the same unity. Science is possible, intelligent investigation of phenomena is understandable. Only on this fundamental assumption that there is one Mind, which is progressively revealing itself in cosmic evolution, through this dual channel of the mental and the natural order, a Mind that is revealed in the human intelligence on the one side, and in cosmic evolution on the other. This is the basal hypothesis of science. Knock it off, and the entire superstructure of laws and truths, of large generalisations and luminous classifications that science has so labouriously built up, will at once tumble down to pieces. By what name you call it, does not matter; what other ideas or ideals you may be tempted by habit and tradition or compelled by your thought and emotions, to wrap about it, does not count here; the fundamental fact is that you have to accept this Universal, this Cosmic Mind as the working basis of science. This Universal Mind, conceived not as one but as many in primitive, and as a supernatural, magnified Man in mediaeval culture,—is the common implication, however, of both the "theological" and the "positive" stage of human evolution. And the denial of so fundamental a fact can only be explained as a temporary aberration of the intellect due to the inevitable confusion of revolutionary and transitional epochs. This denial, however, is less loud and insistent today than it was a hundred or even fifty years ago.

CHITRANGADA.

And she with passion cried: "Do I remember?
 Yes, I remember. What other thing can I Remember, till forgetfulness arrives?
 O endless moments, O rainhaunted nights,
 When thou art far! And O intolerable,
 The grey austere discomfortable dawn
 To which I shall awake alone! And yet
 This year of thee is mine until the end.
 The Gods demand the rest. With all myself
 I loved thee, not as other women do,
 Piecemeal, reluctantly, but my whole heart
 And being like a sudden spring broke forth
 In flowers and greenness at my sungod's touch.
 Ceding existence at thy feet. Therefore
 I praise my father's prescient love
 That kept me from the world for thee, unsought
 Amid the rugged mountains and fenced in
 With barbarous inhospitable laws.
 Around the dying man the torches flared
 From pillar to weird pillar; and one discerned
 In fitful redness on the shadowy walls
 Stone visages of grim un-Aryan gods.
 The marble pallor of my father's face
 Looked strange to me in that unsteady glare,
 As if an alien's, and dream fantasies
 Those figures seemed of Manipurian lords Strange-weaponed, rude, with faces fierce and gnarled,
 Like those they worship. Unafraid I stood
 With grave and wide-orbed gaze contemplating
 Their rugged pomp and the wild majesty
 Of that last scene around my dying sire.
 Round the fierce circle to that audience called Entrusting me of each rough-featured lord.
 So were their thoughts conciliated; so
 Their stern allegiance was secured. He spoke,
 And, though of outward strength deprived, his voice

Ring clear yet as when o'er trumpets heard
 It guided battle. "Warriors of my East, Take then this small white-bosomed queen of yours;

For I am ended and the shadow falls.
 She is the stem from which your kings shall grow

Perpetual. Guard her well lest Fate deceived
 Permit unworthier to usurp my child
 Than the unconquerable seed of gods.
 Oppose, oppose all alien entry here,
 Whether by force or guile the stranger comes.
 Serry your bucklers close to overwhelm
 The invader, seal your deaf and pitiless ears Against the suppliant and the guest. He sole Whom Fate intends to bring shall break through all

The dangers threatened, hindrance interposed,
 To grasp this prize, whether Ixvaacou's clan
 Yield a new Rama or the Bhoja hear
 And raven for her beauty, Vrishny-born,
 Or else some lion's whelp of those who lair
 In Hustina the proud." He spoke no more

But the great name until his spirit passed.
 Then the grim lords forgot their savage calm.
 A cry arose, "Our queen!" and I was caught
 From breast to breast of wild affection; all
 Crowded upon me kissing feet and hands,
 Recording silent oaths of love. Secure,
 Alone in this wild faithful barbarous world,
 I ruled by weakness over rugged hearts,
 A little queen adored,—until at length
 Thou camest. Rumour and widemouthed alarm
 Running before thy chariot-wheels thou camest,
 Defeat and death thy envoys and a cry:
 O Manipurians, Manipurians, arm!
 Some god incensed invades you,—surely a god
 Incensed and fatal, for his bowstring huge Sounds like the crack of breaking worlds and thick
 His arrows as the sleet descends of doom
 When the great Serpent wakes in wrath. Behind,
 That cry the crash of hostile advent came,
 Thy chariot caked with mire and blood, its roof
 Bristling and shattered from the fight, thy steeds
 White with the spum of leagues, though yet, they neighed
 Lusting for speed and battle, and in the car
 Thy grandiose form o'ertowering common mould, While victory shone from eyes where thunder couched

Above his parent lightning. Swift to arms
 My warriors sprang, dismayed but faithful, swift Around me grow a hedge of steel. Enraged, Thy coursers shod with wind rushed foaming on
 And in with crash and rumour stormed the car
 To that wide stone-paved hark there loudly paused, While thunderous challenge of the stamping
 hooves

Claimed all the place. Clanging thou leapedst down,
 Urjoon, Gandeva in thy threatening grasp.
 Then I beheld thy face, then rose, then stretched
 My arms out, pausing not to think what god Compelled me from my throne. But war came in Between me and those sudden eyes. One bold Beyond his savage peers stood questioning forth:
 "Who art thou that with challenge insolent
 Intruding; from what land of deathless gods
 Stormest with disallowed exulting wheels
 In white Chitrangada's domain? To death
 Men hasten not so quickly, Aryan lord."
 Hero, thy look was calm, yet formidable,
 Replying, by thy anger undisturbed.
 "To death I haste indeed, but not to mine.
 Nor think that Doom has claimed me for her own Because I sole confront you. For my name
 Ask the pale thousands whose swift-footed fear
 Hardly escaped my single onset; ask
 Your famous chieftains cold on hill or moor
 Upon my fatal route. Yet not for war
 I sought this region nor by death equipped,
 Inhospitable people who deny
 The human bond, but as a man to men
 Alone I came and without need of fear,
 If fear were mine to feel. Nor trumpets blared
 My coming nor battalions steel enforced,
 Who claimed but what the common bond allows."

To be continued.

LAND AND ITS PEOPLE.

Of those who are truly the People they are jealous of their land, the woods and the fields, and the open sea are covered with their love—separable from life.

Every thing that the land has calls an answer in the breasts of the people, and quickly grows love for the use of those that live on it.

Without this love, no people can exist; this is the creation, nourishment and defence of nations.

Between a great people and the earth springs a passionate attachment, lifelong—and the earth loves indeed her children, broad-breasted, broad browed and talks with them night and day, storm and sun-shine, summer and winter alike.

(Here indeed is the key to the whole secret of education.)

Owners and occupiers then fall into their places: the trees wave proud and free upon the headlands, the little brooks run with a wonderful new music under the brambles and the grass.

Determined—is the word henceforth to worship nothing, no ownership, which is unreal—no false deeds, no money-smells, respectabilities, authorities.

To be arrogant, unpersuadable, faithful free—not unworthy of the trees waving upon the high tops and of the earth rolling through the starlit night.)

Government and laws and police then fall into their places—the earth gives her own laws. Democracy just begins to open her eyes and peep and the table of unfaithful bishops.

priests, generals, landlords, capitalists, lawyers, kings, queens, patronisers and polite idlers goes scuttling down into general oblivion. Faithfulness emerges, self-reliance, self-help, passionate comradeship.

Freedom emerges, the love of the land—the broad waters, the air, the undulating fields, the flow of cities and the people therein, their faces and the looks of them, no less than the rush of the tides and the slow hardy growth of the oak and the tender herbage of spring and stiff clay and storms and transparent air.

I see a great land poised as in a dream—waiting for the word by which it may live again.

I see the stretched sleeping figure—waiting for the kiss and the re-awakening.

I hear the bells pealing, and the crash of hammers, and see beautiful parks spread—as in a toy show.

I see a great land waiting for its own people to come and take possession of it.

THE ANCIENT ABBEY OF AJANTA.

Chaitya—Bui ling used by Buddhist monks for united worship. Strictly comparable to Christian Churches, which resemble it to an extraordinary degree, even now. The differences between nave and aisles are exactly the same. A dagoba occupied the place of the altar. Ajanta has four chaityas.

Vihara—A Buddhist monastery. At first these consisted of a central space of irregular shape, with small cells opening into it. Afterwards, it becomes a quadrangle or main court with a great sanctuary, on its longest side, containing an image of Buddha, pillared aisles and verandah, and cells, as in the earlier examples. There are twenty-two chhatras many unfinished, at Ajanta.

Dagoba—A stupa or tope erected over the ashes or relics of a great teacher. An open-air stupa is the Sanchi Tope. There are dagobas within all the four Chaityas at Ajanta. Evidently the form was sacred.

Like the curves and columns of some great organ, runs the line of stone arches and colonnades along the hillside that faces to the sunrise, in the glen of Ajanta. Twenty-six caves there are in all, making one long level line, overhung by the rounded ridge of dark blue stone that was undoubtedly chipped into shape and bareness long long ago, to emphasise that balanced uniformity which gives to this ancient abbey so much of its solemnity and beauty. As we first see the caves, from the boulder-strewn stream, some hundreds of feet away, they appear like a succession of pillared verandahs, broken once near the middle, and diminishing in the distance, in the tall arched fronts of great chaitya-halls. It is thus that we first become aware of Caves Ten and Twenty-six, and are affected by their severity and regularity as it by music. In reality, Nine and Nineteen are also chaityas. But both are slightly masked by masses of rock, and only Ten and Twenty-six stand out, in this first view.

How lonely and remote is this glen in which we find them! It lies crescent-shaped amongst its hills, so that the view from each monastery cave seems closed upon itself. The torrent that runs through it enters, as a great cascade, at the northern end, and leaves this rocky ravine without giving a hint of a world without, where twistings and windings are to bring it to a wider stream. Such are the sites that have ever seemed ideal.

to the monk. The murmur of running waters and the voices of the waterfalls, make to his ear a perpetual plain-song, in unison with the intoning of ancient psalters, and the chanting of texts. In the circling path of the sunlight measured against the green, its first rays at dawn, and its last at cowdust, are signals for rising of bells, and lighting of lamps, for processions, and incense, and sprinkling holy water. The quivering of leaves, through the tropical day, speaks of coolness and shadow, the environment of learning; and the solitude of nature promises remoteness from the world, the only possible environment of holiness. Such must Ajanta have seemed, to the handful of monks who took up their abode in its natural caverns, perhaps a couple of centuries before Asoka. The rough path by which they could climb to their eagle's nests of dwellings, was soon hewn, by their patient hands, into simple stairs. But even these were reached, from the north, only after arduous travel over the boulders by the stream side. A perfect site for a monastery. It is difficult to imagine that amongst the scraped and rugged hillsides of Khandesh, there could have been found another vale, at once so lonely and so beautiful.

Twenty-six caves there are, in all; numbered, in the unemotional fashion of official surveys, in serial order, from North to South. In reality, however, they fall, according to their ages, into some four main groups. The first of these, containing Caves Eight to Thirteen, lies to the left of the stairs by which one reaches the monastery terrace. One arrives on that level, between Six and Seven, and the first seven numbers from the third of the periods. Caves Fourteen to nineteen constitute the second period; and Twenty to Twenty-six, the fourth.

Not that all the caves of any single group were undertaken at once! In each period there is a progression. Sixteen and Seventeen have inscription which, it is said, render them the heart of the matter for they were built during or soon after the lifetime of the great Gupta, "Maharaja Deva" (Chandragupta II. Vikramaditya, 375 to 413 A.D.) by a sovereign who had married his daughter. And Caves Five to One were probably undertaken immediately after.

In any case, it is the first group, of Caves Eight to Thirteen, that for hundreds of years formed the whole glory of Ajanta. Eight and Thirteen may probably have been natural caverns, occupied tentatively, long before the time of Asoka, by a handful of monks. These were days in which kings, rich cities, and great land-owners could scarcely perform a work of greater merit than hewing out caves for the residence of monks. In course of time, therefore, these natural recesses in the rock (which we imagine to have been the motive and starting-point) were transformed into simple monasteries, by first enlarging the centre and then cutting tiny cells, each with its two stone beds and low doorway, round the space, which thus acted as quadrangle or courtyard. Number Thirteen has in addition to these, a small earthen verandah in front. Number Eight has not even this. It seems probable that the occupation began from two points more or less simultaneously, and afterwards worked inwards, for how else are we to explain the fact that Nine and Ten, standing side by side, are both chaityas?

We imagine, too, that the first settlement was early, when faith was strong, and the living impress of the Great Teacher was yet fresh. For how else can we account for the strength that clung to the bare rocks by the torrent-side, with such pertinacity, decade after decade? Were they some band of wandering teachers, we wonder, those first monks, appointed to preach in the countries on the Southern Road, a mission sent to the powerful empire of Ujjain, or an offshoot perhaps from the mother-communities at Bhilsa and Sanchi? In any case, the caves were valuable to them as headquarters during the wet season, when all begging friars are supposed to assemble for the time, in some fixed dwelling place; and during their absences as a body, for eight or nine months at a time, the work of excavation must have taken place. Little did they dream of how well-starred were the spot they had chosen and the day of their advent! We can see, what they could not, close on twelve hundred years of development and gathering fame; the learning they were to send out; the beauty they were to build up; the kings who would delight to honor them; and roads from the far ends of the earth, all meeting on their threshold! Hiouen-Tsang came here, in the middle of the seventh century after Christ, and speaks of the place as "a sangharama constructed in a dark valley. Its lofty halls and deep side-aisles stretch through the face of the rocks. Storey above storey, they are backed by the crag and face the valley." It is evident here, that the English translator,—not having in his own mind, the thing his author was describing—has rendered the text inaccurately. If we read, "its lofty chaityas, and deep viharas at their sides," the statement immediately becomes luminous. Similarly, when later we are told that the great Vihara is about 100 feet high, and the stone figure of Buddha in the middle, 70 feet high, while above is a canopy of seven stages, towering upwards, apparently without support,* it is evident that the great Chinese traveller is speaking of no Vihara, but of the principal chaitya of his own day (Nineteen or Twenty-six!) and that the stone figure he describes is really the dagoba it contains.

The first royal patronage extended to Ajanta must have been given at or soon after the time of Asoka, when the Chaitya known as Cave Nine, and the Vihara numbered Twelve, were built. Every one who takes up the study of ancient sites in India, finds his own indications of age. At Sanchi the gradual modifications in the pictorial treatment of the Asokan rail give us a chronological scale which enables us to distinguish with absolute certainty no less than four different periods of building and sculpture. Here at Ajanta, the time-unit that serves us from the first is the chaitya-facade ornament, taken in conjunction with the Asokan rail. It would appear that the domestic architecture of the age was characterised by the rounded roof which we still see, in the rocky cave of Ajanta; the Asokan rail, used as the front of a verandah; and the horse-shoe window, breaking the line of the roof, or nasaavad. Now the instinct of cave-makers was to make their fronts as closely as possible resemble the outside of the buildings of their period.

But a style creates a tradition, which persists long after the original reason for it has disappeared. Thus the horse-shoe ornament and the Asokan rail become a mannerism at Ajanta, diverging constantly further and further from their true intention; and by three progressive changes we can make a rough estimate of the ages of the caves. In Nine and Twelve, they are used with obvious sincerity, reflecting the conceptions of their age. In the same way that the early printers of Europe laboured to make their machine-printed books look as if they had been written by hand. On Viharas Eight and Thirteen, they do not occur at all. Evidently the founders were too early, or too poor, to indulge in such elaboration. Chaitya Number Ten had a timber front, which has fallen away and leaves no trace of its image or likeness, save in the panels sculptured in the rock on either side. The stone ornaments do not altogether cease, till after Cave Nineteen. At first they are frankly windows in housefronts. In Cave Number Twelve, they are to suggest used fan-lights over the cell-doors, and run round the walls, connecting one with another, in simple dignity. In Caves Six, Seven and Fifteen, we find the spaces filled with lotus patterns, and the semicircular opening no longer has a definite meaning. They are no longer windows. They are now only decorative. On the facade of Cave Nineteen, foreign influences are at work. A horrible vulgarity has come over the workmen, strictly comparable to the degrading effects of European taste on Indian crafts to-day. Each of these once beautiful outlines is now filled with a hideous grinning face, altogether meaningless. From the chequer-work which recurs here again and again, (an ornament common amongst the Gandhara sculptures, in the Calcutta collection), it is clear that these influences have come from the north-west. They are possibly Greek, as transmitted through Persia. There had been a great rapprochement between India and Persia in the course of the fifth century, and no where is the crude secularising effect of the West on Indian taste better illustrated.

Yet nowhere is the sober, synthetising power of the Indian intellect more visible. In spite of its eclecticism of detail, and daring romanticism in the treatment of sacred subjects, Nineteen at Ajanta remains one of the architectural triumphs of the world. It is the very flowering-point of a great civic life. The strong porch, brought forward on two solid pillars, suggests the presence and words of the leaders of men; the side-galleries, their supporters and attendants; while on the sill of the great window behind we have room and back-ground for the mounting of a king, or the lying-in-state of the dead.

We are accustomed to think of the hotels de ville of Belgium as the crown of the world's communal architecture. But Belgium has nothing, for simple unity and mastery, to compare with this. It dominates a small court, from which a false step would precipitate one down a steep khud. Obviously the style was not invented for such a position! Here, as at a thousand other points, Ajanta merely reflects the life of India, during one of the greatest periods of her history. Cave Nineteen remains, carved in imperishable rock, when all the buildings of its day have disappeared, a memorial of the splendour and restraint of Indian cities during the ages of the Gupta rule.

BUILDING AND DEDICATION OF STUPAS.

By C. HATAVADANA RAO, B. A.

—10—

The recent discovery of the great stupa built and consecrated by Kanishka, the great Buddhist Emperor; at Peshawar, cannot, I think, be adequately understood, unless laymen possess some knowledge of the methods adopted in older days in India and Ceylon, in the building and dedication of stupas. An excellent description of one of the many dedication ceremonies that took place in those ancient days is fortunately left to us in the Ceylonese National Chronicle, known as the Mahavamsa. Whatever may be the historical worth of this great work, it must undoubtedly be held to give accurate particulars of ceremonial matters. So that scholars can have little hesitation in accepting these particulars from it, the more so when they have the additional merit of explaining the minute details laid bare in the opening of stupas, and sometimes (as at Sanchi) in enabling them to understand the various scenes pictured in the bas reliefs. The building and dedication ceremony was apparently a grand affair, if we may believe the account in the Mahavamsa of king Duttagamini's erection and consecration of the Mahathupa Sonnawali in Ceylon. It is clear from it, that when a wealthy or powerful person undertook to build a stupa, he first raised a pillar on the spot, inscribed with a record of his intentions. This pillar was afterwards removed, when the building of the stupa was actually commenced. The Raja Devanampuja Tissa, who began his reign in 240 B. C., wished to raise a stupa on a spot consecrated by teachings of Buddha. But he was warned by the illustrious Mahinda to refrain from doing so, because that great work was reserved for Duttagamini. He therefore, contented himself by merely raising a stone pillar with the usual inscription on it recording his pious wish. Duttagamini, who reigned over Ceylon between 161 and 137 B. C., "meditating," as the Chronicle puts it, "on the tradition that had come down to him from Tissa's time, caused a search to be made in his place for the record containing it. He found, it is recorded, a vase an inscribed golden plate, and there on he read: "Hereafter, at the termination of one hundred and fifty-six (? forty-six) years, the monarch Duttagamini, son of Kakavanna, will construct such and such edifices in such and such manner." Overjoyed at this he resolved on the construction of the stupa and intimated the same to the priests. "I will build for you," he said, "a place like unto the place of the Devas and soon carried the promise into effect by building one in the Mahamegha garden and presented it in due solemnity to the priests. He then meditated on the construction of the stupa. The divine architect, Vishvakarma, got ready the bricks necessary for it, for the king was unwilling to exact forced labour from his subjects (which apparently was usual in such matters), the more so as they were yet suffering from the war waged for the subjection of the Tamils. The foundations were formed of round stones brought by soldiers, well-beaten down with pounders and trodden down by "enormous" elephants whose feet were protected in leather cases. Above it was spread a layer butter-like clay from Saptapintaka, and over this clay, were successively placed bricks rough cement kumvinda stones, an iron net-work, divine incense brought by the priests from Himavanta, phulika stones (apatite) and, finally, a course of common stone. Then came, successively again, plates of brass eight inches thick embedded in cement made of the gum of the kapitt tree, diluted in the water of the small red coconut, plates of silver seven inches thick and cemented in vermilion paint made in sesamum oil.

The monarch then prepared himself to lay the foundation, which was apparently as imposing an affair then as it is now. On the chosen day he caused the priesthood to be assembled, and addressing them, said: "Revered Lords! intuitive of the construction of the great Chitya, I shall to-morrow lay the festival brick of the edifice; let all our priesthood assemble there." He further proclaimed: "Let all my pious subjects be provided with Buddhistical offerings, as bringing fragrant flowers and other ded). At the four corners of the canopy, a bunch exclusively of pearls was suspended, each of them valued at nine lacs; emblems of the sun, moon and stars, and the various species of flowers, represented in gems, were appended to the canopy. In (the formation of) that canopy were spread out eight thousand pieces of valuable cloths of various descriptions of every hue. He surrounded the bo-tree with a low parapet, in different parts of which gems and pearls of vases filled with the various flowers represented in jewellery, and with the four kinds of perfumed waters, were arranged. On an invaluable golden throne, erected on the eastern side of the bo-tree (which was deposited in the receptacle), the king placed a resplendent golden image of Buddha (in the attitude in which he achieved Buddhahood at the foot of the bo tree at Urvula in the Kingdom of Magadha). The features and members of that image were represented in their several appropriate colours in exquisitely resplendent gems. There (in that relic receptacle, near the image of Buddha), stood (the figure of) Mahabrahma, bearing the silver parasol of dominion; Sakha, the inaugurator, with his Vijayuttra (shank); Panchasikha with his harp in his hand; Kalanaga together with his band of singers and dancers; the hundred armed Mdra (death) mounted on his elephant (Girinekhala) and surrounded by his host of attendants. Corresponding with this altar on the eastern side, on the other three sides also (of the receptacle) altars were arranged, each being in value a koti. In the north-eastern direction from the Bo-tree there was an altar arranged made of the various descriptions of gems, costing a koti of treasure. The various acts performed at each of the places in which (Buddha had tarried) for the seven times seven days (before his public entry into Baranasi), he most fully represented (in this relic receptacle); as well as (all the subsequent important works of his mission). Many of the Jatakas (former existences of Buddha) were also represented; as also mythological kings, princes, yakshas, devas of various kinds one above another, shone--above their heads rows of lamp, in height five cubits filled with aromatic oil and lighted with wicks made of fine cloth. The arrangements inside this receptacle were superintended by the chief thera Indagutta, "master of the six branches of the doctrinal knowledge," who set in all these things in it "without crowding the space."

The receptacle ready, the king convened an assembly of the priesthood and said: "To-morrow I shall enshrine the relics." A proclamation went forth to that effect. Sonuttara, a young priest of 18 years of age was commissioned to escort the relics to the stupa, the relics apparently had been wrested away from the Nagas of Ramagama, which according to the Mahavamsa, the great monarch Dharmasoka had unsuccessfully tried to enshrine at Puppapura, the modern Peshawar where the recent find has been made. The day chosen for the enshrinement was a full-moon day and grand procession that started with the king glowingly described in the Ceylonese chronicle. The whole town was beautifully decorated. At its four gates were placed food and clothing for the people. The king "adorned" in all the insignia of Majesty, and attended by bands of singers and dancers of every description; by his guard of warriors fully caparisoned; by his great military array, consisting of elephants, horses and chariots, resplendent by the perfection of their equipment; mounting his State carriage, (to which) four perfectly white steeds of the Sindhu breed (were harnessed), stood bearing a golden casket for (the reception) of the relics, under the white canopy of dominion. Sending forward the superb State elephant Kandula, fully caparisoned to lead the procession, men and women (carrying) one thousand and eight exquisitely resplendent "Pannaghata" (replenished vases), encircled the State carriage. Females bearing the same number of baskets of flowers and of torches, and youths in their full dress bearing a thousand and eight superb banners of various colours, surrounded (the car) in the united flood of every description of instrumental and vocal music, and the sounds heard from different quarters produced by the movements of elephants, horses, and carriages, the earth appeared to be rending asunder. This pre-eminently gifted sovereign, progressing in state to the Mohanegha garden, shone forth like the king of devas in his progress to his own garden "Nandana." Hearing of the arrival of Sonuttara with the relics, he proceeded towards him and, depositing the relics in the golden casket which he had brought in procession on the crown of his head, placed them up the throne. He then made offerings and bowed down in worship to the relics, there stationing himself with clasped hands uplifted in adoration. Delighted, he then dedicated his canopy of dominion to the relics and invested them with the sovereignty of Lanka, exclaiming in the exuberance of his joy: "Thrice over do I dedicate my kingdom to the redeemer of the world, the divine teacher, the bearer of the triple canopy--the canopy of the heavenly host, canopy of mortals, and the canopy of eternal emancipation." He then lifted the casket to his head and carrying it in procession round the stupa, he ascended it on the Eastern end and descended into the relic receptacle. On all sides, the countless numbers of ashats present with uplifted, clasped hands in adoration, while the king deposited invaluable relics in the splendid altar made for it. He then washed his hands in aromatic water and opening the casket, took the relics up and said: "If it be destined that these relics should permanently repose undisturbed by any (enemies), and if it be destined these relics should remain enshrined (here), providing a refuge of salvation to the people, may they, assuming the form of the divine teacher when lying on the bed on which he attained parinibbana, recline on the superb invaluable altar already prepared here." Thus praying, he deposited the relics on the su-precious affair. The king then dedicated his imperial canopy to the relics, and for seven days invested them with the sovereignty over the whole of Lanka, and while within the receptacle he made an offering of all the regal jewels he had on his person. All round him—the musicians and choristers, the ministers and the people and in attendance—did the same. The king bestowed presents on the priesthood and proclaimed by beat of drums: "let all my people during the ensuing seven days worship the relics." At the end of these seven days, the respectacle was closed by royal order by two sammaneras, Utra and Sumana, with the stone brought by them, chanting among other things, "May these cloud-coloured stones (of the respectacle) for ever continue joined, without showing and interstice." Then the people enshrined, with royal permission, thousands of relics on the top of the shrine before the masonry dome was closed, which was soon after done and crowned by a square capital. Only the Acheitya and the plastering remained to be done, for the completion of the stupa. Bhattagamini was, at this stage, taken ill, and he sending for his younger brother Tissa, said to him: "Perfect the work still left unfinished at the stupa." As the king was in the last stage of sickness, Tissa caused the stupa to be covered quickly with white sewn cloth, and erected a temporary spire of bamboos, and in the same manner formed a temporary parapet round the pinnacle, representing these on the sun and the moon; and painted the same most beautifully with red stick lac and kunkuma. He then announced to the king that the stupa was complete. The dying king repaired thither on his shika, went round it and made obeisance to it by prostrating himself on the carpet spread on the ground. He looked up at the stupa and at the hospitade and was filled with joy. He then discoursed calmly on religion, asked Tissa to finish the stupa in all that remained to be done and begging the priesthood that he may be cremated within sight of the Mahathupa, he closed his eyes gazing on it. The construction of this stupa is said to have cost according to the Mahavamsa, "twenty invaluable treasures" besides "a thousand kotis" expended on minor items connected with it.

Tissa, or Saddha Tissa—his successor, finished the stupa in accordance with the dying brother's request. Other improvements and additions were made a century and a quarter afterwards, between 19 and 9 B.C. by Raj Bhatikabhaya. He added two cornices or copings to the basement of the building. Raja Anandagamini added another chhatra on the pinnacle of the stupa and added coping to the base and crown of the dome. Later kings made other improvements and by them made it look even grander.

That is a very brief account of the manner in which Buddhist stupas were built in olden days. General Cunningham says that the account given in the Mahavamsa "agrees so closely with the present state of the Sanchi chhatra, that it may be taken as an actual description of that building." This makes it clear that the types of stupa architecture in Ceylon and India were the same and there is nothing for surprise in it. As regards the impressive ceremonialism with which the enshrinement of the relic was connected, we may take it that it was the same in both the countries. We may now, in some measure, imagine what like the celebrations connected with the Peshawar relics may have been, bearing in mind the greatness of Kanishka in India and beyond it at the time of their consecration.
